SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 22 CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1900. NO. 547

A TIMELY WARNING.

Trying to Be Sarcastic at the Expense of Our Cause.

"The question of ways and means to advance our cause is one that should interest every Spiritualist.' So says Brother Francis in his editorial, "Hints for the Good of the Cause," in The Progressive Thinker, No. 541. Now, if he or some good brother or sister away down there in the middle rows somewhere will kindly explain and define for us just what "Our Cause" is, that we are interested in and should advance, maybe this will help us all to understand just where we are "at" in relation to it. It might be well for us to know just what it is that we should unite on; that in spite of our lethargy and stupidity, egotism and arrogance, Brother Francis says it is making itself felt everywhere; cutting up "high jinks" among the pulpiteers, irritating and worrying "great preachers" and gradually but surely cutting away the ground from under their feet and thus relieving our Christian brethren and co-workers of the mistakes of the past that have for so long a time handicapped them and us.

Will some one who shall build wiser than he or she may know, plainly express in simple language just what we mean by "Our Cause" so that we may unite thereon and therein in a brotherly sisterly endeavor to aid just a little more than we are doing, the glorious reformation we see going on about us?

I suppose it may be considered something of an advance to have it openly acknowledged that we have a "Cause," even if we dare not put it in print; possibly, this is a distinctive gain for us, an improvement over simple disjointed presumption. I have always felt that there may be "something" in Modern Spiritualism; that it really might be a first-rate basis for a "Cause," and now that Brother Francis admits it, maybe we should go just a little further bye and bye, and tell a few of our particular friends, "on the quiet," just what we imagine Modern Spiritualism stands for.

I know, of course, we should be very cautious in this regard for, if we are too radical and progressive everybody will soon know as much as we do about our "Cause," and what it means for them all. I expect we have been too careless about this already, or it may be that the originators of it are no respecters of persons and are just simply going ahead with their projected work, without our aid or advice, just as though we did not know it all anyhow. I hardly know what to make of this, but I suppose they, the aforesaid starters and controllers of Modern Spiritualism do, and are preparing more raw material for us to work with and organize or boss. Or it may be that they are ignoring us altogether and intending to turn this whole matter over to those who know a good thing when they see it and who are now beginning to substitute it for the harsher creeds and vain doctrines they have so long and mistakenly championed.

Now, of course we all know we do not need a creed or anything of that sort that shall convict us of any definite opinion upon anything here or hereafter. We should never commit ourselves to any decided doctrine concerning spiritual truth, because some of our predecessors have perverted this into harmful error and instead of allowing it to benefit mankind directly, have made of it excuses and authority for most cruel oppressions, and we are afraid that we will, or may do likewise.

By all means then, let us rather guess at what our "Cause" is, than to say just what we mean by it, but let us never forget to claim everything in sight as ours by right of prior discovery and maintenance. This is by far the safer plan for us, and so much easier, for, if we were to get to be too "bigoty" and make a parcel of fools of ourselves by openly "giving ourselves away," we'll certainly lose our present prestige as the boss Sect-afraid-of-its-Creed. It may be all well enough to brag about our philosophy, science and religion, but it would be the rankest kind of folly, in my opinion, to state plainly and unequivocally just what we mean by these comprehensive titles, unless we are hunting for trouble in this world and are anxious to put up a little money.

We are getting along nicely now. That gentle, timid, hesitating, self-astonished attempt at a creed by the N. S. A. was such a poor little, half-formed, defective creature at birth and has had so many and so contrary a set of wet nurses ever since, that its cause, if not our "Cause," has had quite a rest lately, I notice.

To be sure, nevertheless and notwithstanding, and just as Brother Francis says, Modern Spiritualism is going right along and making itself felt everywhere, if we are not; all we have to do, in my opinion, is to "lay low" and steer clear of unhandy and inconvenient admissions, creeds and things of that sort; drift along, as it were; keep posted on what the outside world is doing; watch the preachers step down and out of the different churches; permit the scientists and liberals of all denominations to do our share of the work and put up all the money required; wait until the whole world is "coming our way," not forgetting, in the meantime to everlastingly haze every and anybody who dares to be progressive, and then, when victory is assured for our "Cause," simply claim credit for the whole thing and deny any share of it to any one else.

We can do all this without a single line of creed, and in my opinion this is the way for us to do, if we want to avoid trouble and expense and downright hard work. How foolish it would be, then, to put down in white and black, just what the angel world has taught us when we know what this means for us, while so many are opposed to our "Cause" and do not even believe in angels.

"With all its hindrances and drawbacks," and he mentions some of them, Spiritualism is going right along, says Brother Francis: so, what's the need of our doing anything or spending any of our hard-earned money in a foolish attempt to assist what is doing so well without us? We had better spend our little cash for something useful, that we apparently cannot do without—cigars, shows, beer and fun. What's life for, anyway, if it isn't to have a good time in? Spiritualism is all right, and as long as we can keep people guessing what our "Cause" is and means, and we strictly refrain from rashly committing ourselves to any general and reasonable expression of it, which shall simply and plainly state just what it is, just so long we may pose among ourselves and to each other as the greatest among modern reformers, without its costing us a cent and the world being any the wiser.

It is well enough too, I suppose, to talk and write about our "Cause" but we should be extremely careful lest we encourage or indorse any attempt to let the heathen world outside of us know what it is. It will never do for us Spiritualists, who are the very smartest people on earth to-day, as we all know, to get together on an issue and "go for" the balance of the world. We are all agreed upon this one point, I'm sure. So we had better keep our "Cause" right where it is, if we can, so that no living person, carnate or decarnate, can tell just what we mean when we speak or write of our "Cause"; keep everybody mystified and uncertain about it and us, and maybe we will be allowed to get through our few short years here with just as little trouble and expense as possible.

It may appear to some as though there were an inconsistency between the first and last parts of this article, but as astronomers tell us is the case with other heavenly bodies, this is due to aberrations occasioned by the attraction of different influences, invisible and sometimes hard to recognize, that affect men as well as planets and are, in this case, merely mental aberrations dut to this cause, common to Spiritualists, and notably in this matter of a "Cause," concerning which we aberrate just a little more than we do on any other subject.

MAN WORSHIP,

As It Is Illustrated In Dewey.

An ancient Greek philosopher described man as a "two-legged featherless animal." He is all that and something more, while there are other animals to which this definition also applies.

Other philosophers have distinguished man as "a worshiping creature." Travelers claim to have found men who do not worship. Sir John Lubbock and others have raised the question whether there is any more real worship among some of the lower tribes, like the Araffuras for instance, than among dogs who bay at the moon. Be this as it may, worship, if in some forms it may be so-called, is common to the human race, in civilized and savage conditions.

It is perhaps the faintest among men of modern nations who are absorbed with commercial pursuits and dominated by materialism—not philosophical materialism, but the materialism of life. The masses have no faculty for abstraction and with them the object of worship must take a concrete form. If they cease to recognize and reverence an unseen personal anthropomorphic being, the religious sentiment instinctively seeks objects in the visible world. The ancient Romans deified their emperors. On the other hand the God-believing and God-fearing Puritans had no use for obsequious ceremonies to kings and nobles.

In these times of intense worldliness, when the thoughts of men are confined to the visible and the present, man-worship is almost as common as it was among the Romans in the days of the Empire.

This is illustrated in the case of Dewey. He was unknown a little more than two years ago. He sailed into Manila harbor with the American Asiatic squadron and sank a number of old Spanish tubs, armed with short range guns. He did his work well. He showed decision, promptness, courage and executive ability—common American traits. He had under him officers and men capable of accomplishing the work under his command.

There are probably scores of officers in the American navy who, if the work had devolved upon them, would have done it quite as well. But it was reserved for Dewey, and from the day of its accomplishment Dewey has been an object of hero-worship equal to that bestowed upon the most honored conquerors in Pagan Rome.

The names of the officers who advised Dewey and immediately commanded the American warships are but dimly remembered, while the brave boys who manned the guns and did the work are merely an anonymous multitude. Their names are unknown.

Dewey is the god. All the praise is lavished upon him. All the honors are bestowed upon him. He receives the credit which should be distributed among the officers and sailors of the American squadron. He receives not only recognition and praise, but more money by contributions than can be obtained for the families of the 200 miners who perished in Utah the other day. All this is in the name of patriotism!

Admiral Dewey himself, an intelligent gentleman, must wonder whether there is not something in these indiscriminating and excessive demonstrations which is of the nature of unreasoning adulation and superstition.

Honor Dewey, but honor also his officers and the men who were behind the guns and let not the honor take the form of man-worship.

SPIRIT ANIMALS.

Do They Exist, or Do They Not?

The last letter from Spirit Franz Petersilea, through the mediumship of his son, Carlyle Petersilea touches upon a subject over which there has been and I suppose ever will be much controversy; that of animal existence in spirit life. He stated that dogs, lions, etc., were there, and also stated that the dogs on the earth plane could see him as well as sense him as he approached his son's home.

Philosophers are constantly philosophizing and declare that spirits of animals do not exist after death, etc., yet many intelligent Spiritualists are inclined to believe the opposite. As a clairvoyant and trance medium I hope I am not being deceived by something or some spirits in regard to this matter.

I have seen the fac-simile of dogs and cats which have formerly been my companions, after they have been taken from me by death. Sometimes I have thought, might it be the love I hold for these dear little creatures that enables me to hold them to me for a time? Or may it be that unconsciously I psychologize myself into the thought of seeing them?

My spirit friends say such is not the case, as the pets are really in existence "over there."

A few years ago I was the possessor of three very beautiful Japanese spaniels. "Yum-Yum," the smallest, yet oldest, was a most beautiful dog. She seemed possessed of rare spiritual power or perception and I know saw many of my spirit friends.

She was accustomed to lie in the hallway at the top of the stairs, and I would notice her often start from a sound sleep and begin to bark. No one had entered at the door, yet Yum-Yum would run towards what I thought was an imaginary object, still keeping up her bark. One day I saw a large Indian spirit who was familiar to me coming up the stairs and the dog acted as she had on former occasions.

The Indian spoke to me, saying, "The dog sees me. I'll go to her and pinch her. You watch." He did as he said. The dog jumped up snapped at the Indian and ran to me for protection. After this it was no uncommon thing for me to see Mr. Indian and Yum-Yum in their play or quarrel, whichever it may have been.

All three of the dogs have passed away, and many times when my thoughts have been far away from them I have had my attention drawn to them by having them jump into my lap as of old.

Other departed pets have also greeted me many times in the same way.

That many others see clairvoyantly I have no doubt. On one occasion my husband and myself were riding through the woods. The horse kept shying every little bit, and being an exceedingly gentle horse we were both very much surprised. At last I noticed the same Indian previously spoken of, standing in the road a few feet away. On arriving at the place where the red man stood, the horse again shied and jumped to the side of the road. This continued about one hour, during which I watched the Indian run ahead and station himself at certain points to see the horse start and run, invariably on arriving at the place where the Indian stood. When the hour was about up, the Indian said, "I'll not let the horse see me any more and he'll go all right." Such was the case, the animal recovering his former gentle manner all through the entire trip.

Mr. Cooley and myself are very fond of animals and perhaps may be a little partial to them, yet I should hate to know that so much intelligence as we see displayed by many animals is all lost at their death, for the want of a spirit to sustain the same.

However, I trust that time and growth will explain all things about which we now disagree.

GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY.

MAY SWEETNESS.

May is opulent in sweetness; oh, the freshness of the air!
And the dainty bits of greenness on the boughs all winter bare;
Not enough to hide the song-birds if they tried the trick, I ween,
For the foliage in Maytime is but just a dash of green.

Tiny home-makers are searching the material for nests,
For father-heart and mother-heart beat 'gainst the feather vests;
The singers sing their sweetest, but a melting minor strain
From the ring-dove seems to utter resignation, love and pain.

Bonny violets upspringing through the tender leaves of grass,
Young Spring's ever heavenly darlings, smiling to you as you pass;
Water-cresses in the brooklet, spiced with somthing wild and fine,
Big-leaved mandrakes, half unfolded, lowing of the happy kine.

Lilacs working at their flower plumes, and the perfume faint and dear,
Soon to hang in pale profusion in the ambient atmosphere;
Pear trees whitening, cherries, apple blossoms pushing out,
Honey bees, and wasps, and hornets putting nervous folks to rout.

Grandpa, housed all winter, planting out potatoes, hunting seeds,
Looking forward to the garden for the household's many needs;
Mary planting morning glories, she a morning glory, too,
Twining 'round our hearts completely, ever balmy, ever true;

And so much, much more in springtime—something startling every day!
Bursts of song, and bursts of sunshine, all Life's forces full in play!
What! A telegram! "Come quickly; Father died last night." Ah, May!
All your vigorous growing beauty feeds on death. All fade away.

IS FRAUD INCREASING?

Shall We Tolerate or Eliminate This Element.

Spiritualism has not been jesting for these fifty years, and yet it has driven away more frowns and created more smiles than any or all the religions of the past.

When science ran up against religion, tottered, and was about to fall back into the dark and dismal tomb as the end of man, Spiritualism caught it in her long and loving arms, and drawing its fainting form to her motherly breast, gave it new life, new hope, and a new field of expression; told those old despairing philosophers to look up and march onward into the laboratory of Nature. They came up out of protoplasm, into ether, molecules, magnetism, hypnotism, electricity, Spiritualism, and through suggestions from all these new spheres of thought have evolved many new inventions and utilized powers previously unknown.

Mothers who had lost the last of their loved ones in dark and gloomy death, have again been shown their faces, and have pressed their forms to their own across the threshold, and received their loving messages from the spirit-world and been made contented with a life that would have been so sad and lonely with the lost ones gone forever.

Husbands and wives have been reunited after years of sorrowful separation.

Lovers who, parting at the grave, with souls and bodies twined and intertwined, and refused to break asunder even at the call of death, have met and renewed their pledges of love and constancy, and vows of unselfish wishes towards each other.

Spirits who have been lost in the darkness and fog of ignorance and superstition have been helped to discern the light after ages of spiritual unconsciousness, and have come to earth to begin again where they left off, when death closed their eyes from the earthly scenes and friends.

Priests have returned and voiced regrets that they had helped to hold the spirits of men and women in the prison of darkness and terror, by their horrible tales of punishment for sins that were only errors of the flesh and mind.

Ministers of every denomination have come back through sobs and tears of grief for those who might have progressed while here had they not imposed upon them all the fears of endless hell; have come back to tell of the hell they had made for themselves by delusive teachings to their fellow-men.

Little children are now whispering through the thin veil and appearing at the parting for a kiss from "mamma" and "papa."

No, indeed, Spiritualism has not been jesting through all these years. It has been presenting a plain unvarnished truth in terms of no uncertain sound.

It has been progressing, unfolding, blooming, even in the shadows of stupendous fraud and the clanking chains of human slavery.

Unorganized and bitterly opposed by a foe that should have been its warmest friend, it has labored for all that has been obtained, and fought for every inch of territory now occupied by its lecturers and mediums, and their supporters; driven the nail of truth into the minds of the crowned heads and scientists of the world. Judges on the bench and lawyers at the bar have recognized that beneath the rough surface of fraud and disgusting practices usually shown up in our courts, there is a deep undercurrent of truth that is bound to come out of all this riff-raff and gush of humbuggery.

Now that we have organization, if we cannot clean up our own door-yards we should build a high board fence around our beautiful possessions or turn them back to disintegration and let churchianity severely alone.

True, there are in our ranks, good and honest people, who would castigate us for even mentioning the word fraud, but it is hard to see how the act of confession and expurgation can seriously impede our growth.

There is more need of fearless fighters than timorous goody-goodys in the name of Spiritualism to-day. It stands out against the cloudy horizon of old superstition as a sun of light. It walks across the dead-line of all religions and shakes hands with science and invites investigation. It rises from the ashes of the dead past and incites intellectual revolution. It stems the tide of unpopularity into which it was cast when a babe. It abrogates many of the man-made edicts and clings to nature's principles for support. It ever hands down to man proof of the continuity of life and cries out against blind faith. It pushes on and on, and recoils not from the sacred duty of enlightenment and upliftment because a few barnacles are fastened to its hull and because men are pointing them out. With characteristic dignity and the persistency of Dame Nature herself it ploughs through the tempestuous billows of prejudice, vituperation and contumely cast up by the whole religious world.

But we are not to sit in silence with our elbows on our knees, with our chin upon our thumbs listening to the voices from soul-land and let these barnacles eat through and totally destroy our grand old ship and let these mountebanks drain the public purse of the shekels intended for genuine Spiritualism. Indeed, if the cause had received all that was supposed to have been paid for the truth, but that passed into the hands of the tricksters, there would be reared in its name a beautiful Home, at Washington, D. C.; medium's homes in every state; orphans' homes; temples and other very much needed structures, all paid for and endowed with a sufficiency for future support.

"But," says the timid, "You must let that element alone and it will die a natural death. Truth will prevail. You must stop parading our grievances before the world. Let them alone lest you might rap a genuine once in a while."

"Die a natural death!" It looks that way, doesn't it, when they are the only ones who are really fattening, and upon the very cream intended for genuine mediums?

COMMENDATION.

Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World.

To the Editor:—Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World came with a promptness which distinguishes you as a first-class business journalist and proprietor of the best Spiritualist paper in the world.

I was ill when it came, or should have acknowledged its receipt ere this. I have been so unfortunate as to contract the dreadful complaint, acute rheumatism. It is like a snake in the grass—you never know when it may attack. I am doing all I can to master it with a remedy which I find is helping me. Perhaps when the weather is more settled, God's love will shine upon me again.

I must tell you what I think of your premium book, Volume 3 of The Encyclopedia of Death. I cannot find language that my feeble pen can clothe the thoughts that gladden my heart. It is filled with truths and knowledge interesting to the human race. It removes the fear of death, with life. The able writers who have contributed to its pages with perfect authenticated truths of experiences of their own, and others where doubt hath no foothold, and where the white-robed angel stands ready to unlatch the gate that opens to the elysian fields of life. Every Spiritualist in the world should possess the three volumes of The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the spirit World for their library or collection of Spiritual literature. To me they are invaluable. I trust that you may stay long enough in the valley called life to issue Volume 4, and should you gladden the world with the fourth volume, and I am still in this life, I can give you one of the most wonderful experiences on record, and will do so with the greatest heart pleasure, should you so desire. Do not stop the glorious work till Volume 5 is reached. You are the only one of all that can accomplish the work successfully. I am in daily converse with one who dwells on the "flowery divide," who knows all about you and your work, and they tell me this, and I know that they can see much further than we—they tell me you will be sustained. Thanks for the prompt favor.

"Truth will prevail" if it can find soldiers to fight its battles and the enemy is not too numerous and strong.

As to our "grievances," there would be none if the world did not keep pointing them out to us. True, it is a grievance, a kind of subdued anxiety, a smothered disgust to know all to be fraud that the world points to as such, and then keep silent; but when the world knows we hate the thing worse than anybody else and are endeavoring to purge it from our midst, the honest, the credulous world will like us better and honor us for our sincerity and desire to be clean.

For me, give me the genuine or give me naught. I think more of an honest sincere Catholic or Protestant than of a so-called Spiritualist who goes about in the false garb of a medium or lecturer with the only aim that of financial gain.

Mediums must live, but when the genuine falls into the depth of disgrace of the charlatan there is something wrong with the conditions; something rotten with our system that makes it necessary that they stoop so low to even make a living. More sympathy for the genuine mediums who appear to be driven to this method to compete with the trickster and less anxiety for the marvelous, would help remedy the matter. The formation of a Truth Order for "white-listing" the good and true would do good work. It isn't expected that every Spiritualist become a detective, but that he should read, reason and go about with his eyes open.

If we are humbugged must we go about with our mouths shut for fear we will be shot, and because an editor once "lost his life fraud-hunting?" He was probably not very discreet or good in discriminating, but in daring and search for the true the world needs another John C. Bundy. Now don't go mad and bite yourself because we speak well of this man who made himself odious in his day for his seemingly indiscriminate onslaught upon mediums. There is such a thing as taking too radical a stand, but we need and are getting men in the lead now who sense the needs of the hour, and who are willing to sacrifice property, popularity, and even an earthly existence in the defense of true Spiritualism, true teachers and true media. In fact, we are in this respect getting a few Bundys.

"Let them alone. Let them dupe others as they duped me. Let them alone for fear the world will know we know they are among us." Rot!

Point them out that the world may shun them as they would a viper, is the proper method. Not to show up individual character, but to destroy their methods of swindling; playing upon the credulity of the honest along the line of this sacred gift of the spirit.

DR. T. WILKINS.

HYMN NO. 9.

On earth no more he'll greet us,
He now is with the blest;
He got appendicitis,
And the doctors did the rest.

Heavenward now his flight is,
His soul will join the blest;
He got appendicitis,
And the doctors did the rest.

He didn't have appendicitis,
For the doctors they came;
They cut him open just the same,
Thinking they'd gain fame.

They found he had the colic,
At their mistake they cried;
They fixed him up so nicely
That the poor man died.

His suffering now is over,
This tale's no idle jest;
The doctors helped so nicely,
The undertaker did the rest.

BURN THE WITCHES.

The Pressing Need in the Churches.

On every side there is complaint that the influence of the churches is declining. Revivals are ineffective and the empty pews increase. There is default in meeting the minister's salary and heresy trials are becoming distressingly common. There must be some cause for all this. What is it, and what is the remedy? How can the church be restored to the once dominant place it held three or four centuries ago?

First, as to the cause. It is solely attributable to infidelity in the church itself. Some of its most prominent speakers and advocates are saturated with infidelity; not the open and frank skepticism of a Paine or an Ingersoll, but the more insidious, corroding infidelity of hypocrisy and omission; the infidelity that vauntingly boasts of its support of the church and that draws its sustenance from it while it neglects to carry out those fundamental requirements that are essential to its vitality and perpetuity. It is the infidelity of such men as T. DeWitt Talmage and the fat and well-kept bishops of the church, that is sapping its strength and carrying it down to destruction. Some of them may not be conscious of their guilt, others may not care as long as they can derive a satisfactory revenue from a declining organization.

To restore the church to its primitive strength, there are certain requirements that must be adhered to, as rigidly as the law of gravitation is considered in erecting a stable building. If the church was strong once, what gave it strength then must again be put in operation. This is simply the recognition of the well-known law that like causes produce similar effects. To begin with, then, there must be a cessation of all this twaddle about the higher criticism and a return to the faith in the absolute inerrancy of the Bible. It must be accepted, every letter and word as it is issued from the hands of the printer, as being divinely placed and God inspired; there must be no compromise on this point, no higgling, no discussion. Just as soon as anyone is allowed to make any amendment or substraction some one else of different views will demand the same right, and the final result will be disintegration of material and destruction of faith.

Added to the persistence and integrity of the holy text there must be a cheerful compliance in carrying out the mandates of the inspired word. There must be an immediate observance and enforcement of the long-neglected eleventh commandment, which is, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." I want the reader of this to observe that this order is fully as mandatory as that relating to murder or theft. The wording is, "Thou shalt not"—it is not should not, or otherwise provisioned, but is as clearly and forcibly expressed as any of the commands of the decalogue; and only the infidelity of the church has prevented this inspired command from being enforced. When has anyone heard Mr. Talmage or the aforesaid fat and well-clothed bishops advocate or demand the execution of a witch? When have they petitioned the legislature to make statutes for or to prescribe the method of removing from this sin-cursed world the obnoxious and contaminating witch? Their wretched infidelity has caused them to overlook and omit this sacred duty. When the church was the strongest, thousands of these social pests were publicly cremated and the exhibition gave greater grace to the saints. In this wicked age shall God's command be ignored? Can his pretended servants escape condemnation by trying to put God in the Constitution, when there is not a witch-court in the whole country to carry out one of his most serious edicts? What inconsistency for these God-in-the-Constitution people to be wasting their energies in trying to obtain a public recognition of Deity in the nation's chart, when they have not carried out, or do not try to carry out, the injunctions of that Being that they seek to honor? After they have shown their loyalty by burning a few witches, it will be time enough to demand a deistic amendment to the Constitution.

Many people lose their interest in religion because they fail to realize the awful tragedy of the cross. They need a realistic object lesson showing how true religion is related to agony and sacrifice, and what better use could the wretched witches serve than to be impaled or cremated to comply with the inspired requirement. There are hundreds of people who would gladly go into court and swear to the witch-hood of any person arraigned on the charge of witchcraft. Only try it once and see how loyal some of the minor church members will be when they are "called" to serve their Master and carry out his behests.

Now let us suppose a case that would greatly arouse attention to the church and cause a pentecostal revival. Granted that we have succeeded in discovering and condemning a dozen laudable and robust witches. Chicago being the center of a large population and readily accessible from many directions, let its vicinity be selected for their public execution—say somewhere out on the open prairie where there would be plenty of room for a great multitude. Then procure half-fare rates on the different railroads for a hundred miles around and fix a date for the exhibition, which should be public and made impressive as possible. Then appoint Talmage—assuming that he had been converted from his infidelity—and Covert and Comstock as attendant masters of ceremony, and Sam Jones as alternate. Talmage would make it spectacular enough and sanctify it to the uses of religion. What could be more awfully impressive than the burning of these condemned wretches who had forfeited their right to live, but who by their death illustrated the divine wisdom and the fidelity of the Lord's anointed in removing them to another existence? Why is not this done? Because of the skepticism in the church that doubts that God knew what he meant when he gave the above command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." While this skepticism endures and the pulpits are filled with infidels who do not believe the Bible, or insist on enforcing its mandates, the churches will decline and worship will become a mere conventional formality to gratify the egotism of its devotees.

SOME THOUGHTS

On Spiritualism Versus Materialism.

PART THREE.

True, all isms have grown to have an objectionable tone. And why, friends?

Simply this—every ism under the sun has called forth dissension, wrangling, and bitter enmity.

What the world needs, and has always needed, is fewer isms, fewer iron-bound creeds and articles of faith, and more of the spirit of brotherly love.

A religion which makes love of man the first and only essential is what the intelligence of the twentieth century has a right to demand.

This was the demand made by James, the inspired apostle of old.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God, the Father, is this; to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep yourselves unspotted from the world."

How beautiful in its simplicity!

Yet, we may simplify still further and express it all in the one little word love—broad, comprehensive, universal.

"God is love." "Love is of God." "God is spirit," therefore love is spirit.

The spirit of love dominating all mankind will constitute earth an Eden fair.

When spirit seeks spirit, and blending with it, is responsive to every vibration, then that harmony ensues which renders life one grand, triumphal song.

Then do we see the kingdom begun here.

The work of emancipating from self can only be carried on by spirit development.

Spirit development means sacrifice of material comfort whenever demanded for another's good.

True Spiritualism represents spirit development or growth—yes, eternal growth; and since love is spirit we have our base for spiritual religion—in love as represented in Leigh Hunt's beautiful character of Abou Ben Adhem.

My readers may recall that while the fearless Abou made no claim of love for God, his honest love for his fellowman placed him at the head of the recording angel's list "of those whom love of God had blest."

"The love which seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked.

"Which thinketh no evil.

"Which suffereth long, and is kind." This is the love which proves that the Spirit hath entered and reigns supreme o'er the life.

Then is love prepared to harmonize with the Great Spirit, the pervading power of the universe, and to hold communion with the ministering angels, who, freed from the fetters of earth, become fitting instruments to lead earth's suffering children onward and upward into the light of eternal day.

When we have once grasped our privilege of holding sweetest converse with the spirit land, while still prisoned here in clay, we grope no more in the darkness of despair.

When once we have grasped this sweetest truth, friends, let us not hide our light.

Let us ring the "glad tidings of great joy" throughout the world to cheer and uplift a fainting, struggling, groaning humanity!

Let us proclaim the true gospel of peace and light from the mountain tops, fearing neither shot nor shell—nor shout of derision—nor cry of fanatic—or even of low Spiritualist!

Let us combine forces, all ye lovers of true spirituality, and raising the banner high, proclaim the truth as we know it, maintaining it, sustaining it in its purity, beauty and sublimity, until the mass shall be irresistibly drawn to it by its own electric force.

Our standard must be placed so high, and never lowered for one instant, that our very daring will command attention to the Truth which we represent.

The word which hath been so dishonored, shall yet be honored above all others.

We find those of Spiritualistic faith, with nothing lacking to render them true Spiritualists, except the willingness to accept the ism scattered through all the churches of our land, to-day.

Our duty now is to place the ism beyond reproach.

To prove to all the strength of love and devotion which belongs to this faith, as its birth-right from the spirit.

This our mission to lead others by the golden cord of love, gently up the heights we may have attained, and bidding them scan the horizon with critical eye, impress this truth that they are heirs to freedom, light, peace, joy unspeakable.

What holier mission can we crave, friends, than to assist in upholding the royal banner of truth, by whatever name we call it.

Whether it be Christian Science, Divine Science, Psychology, Theosophy, Spiritualism, or any or all of the isms, we find truth in them all—in spirit—not in letter.

But, as the fundamental principle of all rests in spirit, we will be honest and acknowledge that whatever is ennobling, uplifting, spiritualizing in any of our churches arises from the spirituality or Spiritualism of those churches.

The Spirit calls! Come up, come up,
And dwell in love's own light!
Come and partake from the brimming cup
Which turns darkness into light!

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-TWO.

Sometimes when we are ready to control the one who writes for us, we find agitation of mind on some important subject. Perhaps some article has been read from a paper or book which conflicts with that which we write or teach. Perhaps something has been read that is obnoxious to the mind of our sensitive, consequently we do not always find smooth, placid waters wherein to cast the images of the thoughts which we wish to photograph. We thus find it at this moment, and we must first calm the troubled mind before we can go on with our work. The present disturbed condition has been caused by reading an article in a Spiritual journal, wherein the writer says that Spiritualists should cease to sing of the sweet bye and bye, come down out of the clouds and work for what he calls "this world." By "this world" we suppose he means the material or earthly world or worlds. Many others also say: "Let us have one world at a time. Don't let us waste thought on any other world until we get there. We have all we can do here and now. Let the sweet bye and bye take care of itself. Live only in and for the present."

Now as I, or rather we—for I do not like to ignore the better part of myself, my wife, my other-self, my beautiful Helena—now, as we are in what the writer calls "the sweet bye and bye," and as it is not the sweet bye and bye but the sweet now—the beautiful present time—we think it will not be out of place for us to write of this sweet now; for we are right here and now, and the most of that which we have to tell has already passed, even as this writing will have passed on, or become something of the past, as soon as we have finished it; in fact, each word as we write it has become a thing of the past; but, while we hold our sensitive for the purpose of writing these letters, we flit back and forth a great many times within twenty-four hours, that the connecting link between ourselves and the sensitive may not be broken.

Each time we have put ourselves en rapport with the one who writes for us, we have found this stone which has been cast into the waters; so we thought we would, personally, visit the one who cast the stone, put ourselves en rapport with him, and find out whether he was really living in one world, without giving thought to any other; for, certainly, he ought to be able and competent to do, himself, that which he advises others to do. He says he is a Spiritualist, and if all Spiritualists would do as he thinks they should do, something of importance would be accomplished and a plan presented.

Now if all Spiritualists and others, for no doubt he would like to have others do the proper thing also—as this man thinks they ought to do—why of course he would be the master of the whole world, and all persons would be his obedient servants, for they would all do precisely the thing which he thinks ought to be done. He has not yet said what he thinks ought to be done, but he has said what ought not to be done—that is, "Stop thinking about the other worlds, and the sweet bye and bye, and confine your thoughts to the lower world, the earthly world, the material world. I mean this world wherein I stand. Don't think about any other. Now, right about face! Look at me—straight at me—I say! Don't dare turn your eyes upwards! This earth, and this alone, is the only one you have a right to look at; for have I not said so, and consequently it is so. Now, as soon as you have come into line, and fastened your eyes on this earth, and this alone, and have ceased to sing or think of the sweet bye and bye, I have other commands which I wish you to obey, but I will reserve them until I get you in order, for I cannot do anything at all while you are looking at other worlds and thinking of the sweet bye and bye."

Well, friends, I have given a synopsis of about what we found in that man's mind. We also found in looking over this man's past life, that, as a boy, he used to throw stones vigorously; in fact, he stoned every cat and dog in the neighborhood; he was that kind of boy that breaks every pane of glass in an untenanted house. He used to browbeat and make faces at tiny little girls, and so forth, and so forth. You all understand just the kind of a boy he was; and "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," you can all understand just what kind of a man he is now. He is simply a type of a great many other men, a tyrant on a very small scale. It is well for the world and for all other worlds that their commands are not heeded.

When such men grind you down to the earth earthly, to the exclusion of all other worlds, the next step is to draw the lines still tighter: "Now don't look at any other nation or country than your own;" then, "Don't look anywhere except at me. Now march just as I command you! Think just as I think! I look within for my happiness, and you look at me. If you dare to cast your eyes upward, to the stars, or other worlds, I will throw you into prison or a dungeon where you cannot see them. If you dare to think or sing of the sweet bye and bye," which means of course the other or higher life, "I will perhaps boil you in oil, break you on the wheel, or something." But we think we have said enough to show the tendency of such a spirit.

Now to a spiritual sensitive this is antagonistic and awful. I do not at all wonder that we find the mind of our sensitive in a disturbed condition. If the spirit manifested by that writer caused no disturbance in other minds, we might pass it by without notice, but it really has struck thousands of sensitive spirits in the same way and with the same effect. To the mind, it is the boy who pelts the poor timid cats and dogs with stones, now grown a young man pelting the timid sensitive souls of men and women with stones cast from the mind.

If Galileo had confined himself to one world, you would all be, to-day, in the Dark Ages. The most of those on earth would think it flat, the sun, moon and stars simply lights set in a firmament—"the greater light to rule the day, the lesser light to rule the night." If Benjamin Franklin had confined himself to the earth earthy and had not thought of something above it—had not lived in the clouds, so to speak—electrical, motive, and lighting power would not be known on earth to-day. If Newton had not thought of other worlds, and the power by which they were moved, the great laws of gravitation, attraction and repulsion, magnetism, positive and negative forces, the great eternal cords that hold all worlds and universes together would never have been understood or comprehended in the slightest degree. If Swedenborg, Andrew J. Davis, Hudson Tuttle and others, had not thought of other worlds than the one whereon their feet rested, nothing would have been known of the Spiritual zones. If the little boy who watched his mother's tea-kettle boiling had confined himself to throwing stones at cats and dogs, and had not thought of something more mysterious than the every-day affairs of life, your world would not have had a steamboat, a locomotive, or any other invention driven by steam. If men of old had not thought of gods and goddesses, your world would to-day, be devoid of all architectural beauty and you would, perhaps be still living in tents and wigwams. If aboriginal men had not thought of a great invisible spirit, who dwelt above, causing the winds to blow, the lightning to flash, the thunder to bellow, the waves to roar, and so on through the whole gamut of natural sounds, he never would have stretched the dried skin of a beast across a couple of logs and beat upon it to make a big noise to propitiate the Great Spirit—he never would have stretched his bow-string tight and twanged it for the same purpose; he never would have blown or blared through a cow or ram's horn, nor the tribe congregated together while the young men or warriors beat their log drums, blew their ram's horns, and twanged their bow-strings in concert; and not a musical instrument would exist in your world to-day if they had not; for the bow-string evoluted, at length, into a violin, harp and other stringed instruments, then into a piano; the ram's horn into all kinds of wind instruments, and the log drum into all kinds of drums, big and little. If the men of old had not looked at and thought of other worlds—although not yet understanding them—the sun, moon and stars, worshiping them as gods all-powerful, especially the sun which they worshiped and prayed to, monotonously chanting their prayers, asking the sun to shine and make the grass to grow, that the corn might also grow and ripen that their flocks and herds might be sustained and themselves and those of their households fed and clothed, musical compositions would not exist on your earth to-day; for such men and women were the first composers. They would commence in low, monotonous tones, gradually work into a frenzy of supplication, especially if the seasons were not good or plentiful, and chant, scream, howl, make every sound the throat was capable of producing, thinking that thus the sun might be induced to shine upon them. Afterward came the chanting, singing priests; then chanting choristers; then choirs and chanting choruses; and then, as the ages rolled on, came a Bach, a Mendelssohn, a Beethoven, a Mozart, a Liszt, a Chopin, a Wagner and a countless host of other composers, until to-day your world is filled with music and musicians.

Beethoven was entirely deaf, yet he heard the music of the spheres, for no man had given your world anything like it. His soul heard and gathered that which was not of your world. He was singing of the sweet bye-and-bye—and the heavenly Mozart—what cared he for the earth, earthy? The angels gave him whole sonatas and anthems, perfect in all their parts, with a single impression. To be sure he must write them out afterward, but if he had thought of but one world at a time, those who dealt in that higher and better world could have given him nothing, and he might have rested on a dung-hill, or begged his daily bread from door to door, for he was poor, very poor indeed, in earthly dross.

And now we come to plays or theatrical performances. How and where, think you, these took their rise? In old, ancient China, farther back than any history goes, by Chinamen in their Joss houses. Change the word Joss to God, and God to thunder and you have the meaning of the original word, and theatrical performances had their origin in the following way.

The Celestials desired to please their ruler and on the days when he, together with his retinue, visited the Joss houses, they put on splendid barbaric apparel, apparently glittering in gold and precious jewels. They thought that each season was ruled by a particular God or Goddess, and they in a crude way at first showed how the Gods and Goddesses ruled the seasons, and they could gain the favor of these Gods and Goddesses by talking or parleying with them. They could thus make the seasons propitious. It would make this letter too long to enter into the details, but the God or Goddess of each season was represented, or had a representative—somewhat as the United States sends a representative to Congress from each state to manage affairs to favor the state—and these representatives were supposed to be on familiar terms with the aforesaid Gods and Goddesses and could tell the Emperor and the people at the Joss houses, or houses of thunder, all that each had said and done during the month in which he or she reigned; and it was the barbaric splendor, the music and the acting of all this that first gave rise to theatrical performances.

Every theatre and play on your earth to-day has been gradually evolved from the ancient, native Chinese.

The sun, moon and stars were also represented, or had their representatives, also thunder, lightning, rain, the wind. At length it took weeks of time to perform one play, and it became a yearly carnival of longer or shorter duration.

If the Celestials had never thought of other worlds than their own, there would not be a theatre on the earth to-day, nor an actor. We do not mean by this that they might not have been evolved from other nations, somewhat in the same way, but, simply, that those were the first that your earth ever knew.

People on earth can no more live for one world at a time than man can live for himself alone without reference to his brother man. So, dear friends, think of other worlds in connection with your own—think of the sweet bye-and-bye, and it will not only sweeten your lives but bring you near to the angels, for they are now in that which you call the sweet bye-and-bye, and the closer you come in contact with the celestial life the more celestial and the happier your own lives will be.

By coming en rapport with the higher life, many will be able to benefit the earthly world as these great minds have done that we have already spoken of.

If Edison did not think of the higher life, and put himself en rapport with the angelic world, becoming entirely oblivious to the earth and his surroundings, there would be no telephone, no electric lights, no phonographs, no animated, moving pictures. Yes; and the earthly world is on the eve of a great many other miraculous discoveries and inventions which will be more and more astonishing still, moreover—if Editor Francis had never thought of other worlds and their possibilities, if he had not come in touch with the higher life, if he had not thought the people needed bread from heaven, wherewith to feed their hungry, starving souls, he never would have edited and published The Progressive Thinker. Others have edited and published spiritual papers, to be sure, but Editor Francis has fed the multitude!

MUSIC.

A Grateful Tribute to Prof. J. Jay Watson, the Incomparable Violinist.

Fairest of all arts—the most divine
Such music is, evoked by skill like thine,
O master player. In thy magic hand
Thine instrument is like to wizard's wand,
In vibrant touch with spheres of Paradise.
Anear thou bringst the music of the skies,
Or by thy subtle strains dost draw us near,
The while we list to heaven's harmonious sphere.

O mystic tones from mystic soul within
The throbbing bosom of thy violin!
Not having heard, what mortal ear had guessed
The wondrous sweetness locked within thy breast?
What soul had dreamed the pathos of its sigh,
Had it not caught the tender, soft reply,
Responsive given, unto the pliant bow?
Its strains exultant, who could ever know,
Had not these been by skillful hand distilled,
And sense been stirred, and inmost being thrilled?

Play on, O Master! In such potent strains
Doth lurk the balm for all life's woes and pains.
Who knows the power of Harmony doth know
That from its lack all Mortal ills do flow.
Who knows its power, the secret, too, hath guessed
Of those transcendent states among the blest,
Where all concordant cadences abound;
Where neither instrument, nor voice, nor sound,
Conveys Heaven's rhythmic measure to the ear,
But where, from the all-vibrant atmosphere,
Each living soul with every breath indraws
Music's quintessence through harmonic laws.

Ply then, musician, ply thy flexile bow,
And thou, O instrument, thy tones out-throw
In sweet response unto the master hand,
That all who list may feel and understand
The inmost meaning of that rhythmic force
Which hath in harmony its inborn source.

SPIRIT PICTURES.

Dr. Hansmann's Spirit Photos, Drawings and Messages.

One of the most earnest investigators and believers of Spiritualism in Washington is Dr. Theodore Hansmann, who has been a practicing physician here since before the war. Dr. Hansmann has a host of acquaintances and a very large circle of personal friends, and his earnest belief in the tenets of Spiritualism has, therefore, had a very great influence in modifying the skepticism of many local people. The doctor himself has been a Spiritualist for some eight or nine years, and as he told a Star reporter in a recent conversation, during his early investigation of the subject he was very much opposed to Spiritualism as the veriest unbeliever of to-day. Dr. Hansmann, at his home on W street, has probably the most remarkable collection of Spiritualistic material in existence. It consists of hundreds of photographs with what are claimed to be spirit faces on them; pictures on white china, drawn and painted, so it is claimed, by spirit hands, and by such eminent artistic hands as Reubens, Raphael, Michael Angelo, Velasquez, and a host of others. His library is filled with slates on which he has received what are claimed to be spirit messages and some spirit pictures, while he has shelves filled with note books recounting spirit experiences, and giving verbatim messages which he firmly believes he has received from the spirit land. Such a collection would afford a unique field for the investigator with the time to go through it carefully. Dr. Hansmann showed many of his treasures to the Star reporter at his office a short time ago. A large number of his pictures he has framed, while hundreds of others are mounted in books. There are photographs or paintings of nearly every famous personage in history. The royal family of Germany is represented in nearly every one of its branches, while American history is shown by photographs, messages and drawings of half of the presidents.

Dr. Hansmann of late has been devoting a large portion of his time to spirit photography, and he has many photographs of the most remarkable description. One of them especially, which he is said to have secured very recently, shows him on the same plate eight times, with the light each time coming from a different direction. The picture, it is claimed, was secured at one sitting on a plate which Dr. Hansmann himself purchased from an ordinary supply store.

Speaking of spirit photography, Dr. Hansmann said: "I am sorry to say there was a time when I thought, like you, that nothing could be photographed if invisible to the human eye. Many years ago a friend showed me a photograph with what he said was a spirit on it, and I was such a skeptic that I even doubted the intelligence of my otherwise clear-headed friend. A year later the wife of this same friend obtained a 'spirit' photograph which showed not only her mother, but portraits of departed sisters and brothers. Incredulous, but open to conviction, I went to a spirit photographer myself, and when the picture was developed, on the plate, although I did not recognize them, and did not even have the plate toned for ultimate preservation. Since then I have become absolutely satisfied that the two faces were faces of cousins who had passed away many years before. I have received so many that are to me absolute proofs of the truth of spirit photography since then that I cannot doubt. It is very inconsiderate to say that the sensitized plate cannot show a picture a not clairvoyant person is unable to see. Several years ago I arrived at the conclusion that spirits appear in the ultra-violet rays of light now called Roentgen rays. It is well known to all better-informed men that the sensitized plate attached to the telescope shows stars so distant that even if the astronomer looks through the most powerful telescope he cannot detect them in the sky."—Evening Star, Washington.

The Progressive Thinker of February 24, 1900, page 5 contains: "Wonderful Results in Photography." The photograph of a living woman is taken by means of thought. This highly interesting article, happening to be somewhat inaccurate in regard to my own experiences, induced me to write a few lines.

I have the good fortune to know Mr. Julius Emmner, Jr., personally, and find him to be a man who thinks long before he speaks; he is thoroughly honest and perhaps too modest, but, because being a good medium, he is too frequently attacked by the ignorant, the jealous and the malicious, slandered by those who are not worthy to untie his shoestrings. Mr. and Mrs. Emmner have done more to convince people of the truth of Spiritualism, in their unostentatious manner, than many silver-tongued speakers; this reliable, harmonious pair of mediums have become to be feared by those who thrive on deceit.

The "Thought Machine" I hope and believe will be perfected yet and become a monument to Mr. Emmner's inventive genius. In regard to Mr. Emmner's views that thought might have formed on the photographic plate pictures—as that of Mahomet or the portrait of Mrs. Glenn's lady friend—I allow myself to differ. My experiments in spirit photography have taught me long ago that our spirit friends occasionally try to amuse or tease us and to teach us in a great variety of ways; for instance, when the members of a circle desire earnestly that a cat, to each one's own fancy, might be photographed—it is very likely that a humorous spirit designs a caricature of a feline on the plate.

When I was sitting for a photograph sometimes the spirits have changed, for the sake of fun, my countenance; when at my instigation, two and even three cameras were brought into action simultaneously—the sitter's mustache was represented occasionally so elongated that his friends would have hardly recognized him; at other times playful spirits tried hard to upset our photographic cameras.

I have been sitting alone, uncovered or covered the lens by air pressure—and I found that some invisible one had drawn at the higher part of the right side of my face the portrait of a female, looking toward the right and upward and using my right eye for the left eye of my visitor, but to do so had elevated my own eye about two inches.

Mrs. Glenn is a medium full of promise, but I doubt if her vivid imagination could produce Mahomet's picture; I sooner would think she had attracted that great friend of ladies herself, or some friendly spirit impressed the plate with the portrait in question.

When Mrs. Glenn's lady friend was standing, knocking at the door of the residence of Mrs. Glenn, and she being at Mr. Emmner's photographic studio, a remarkable photograph was produced, undoubtedly her friend Mrs. Frederick upside down, in a costume she never wore before.

I believe, with Mr. Emmner, that our thoughts go in a bee-line toward their aim, but I am very much inclined to think that a spirit, either friend of Mrs. Frederick or of Mrs. Glenn, took a picture of the disappointed lady (not finding Mrs. Glenn at home) and precipitated it on the plate at Emmner's, perhaps when the plate was in the camera yet, and this would better explain the unaccustomed position of Mrs. Frederick.

To show how rapidly the spirits attend to our even not seriously meant wishes, I will narrate the following experience:

A rather pretty lady wished me to try if some of her spirit friends would appear on the sensitized plate. When endeavoring to adjust the lens and seeing her picture on the ground glass of the camera, I involuntarily exclaimed, "What a beautiful portrait this will be!" The lady modestly said she did not care if her own picture was good, if only her invisible friends would show. The result was amusing. One plate showed her left eyebrow drawn up unnaturally high, the other plate showed the lady's mouth utterly distorted; the spirits had granted the lady's wishes—I believe to her own consternation—somewhat neutralized by the appearance of several spirit faces on each of the two plate, on one even her tiny babe. The next time the same lady was sitting she did not mention that she cared not for her own good looks; now her own pictures were beautiful, but not surrounded by spirit faces.

August 22, 1896, we were so fortunate as to get not only a good photograph of my long departed son, but also of several ladies, in full figure. Several months later a lady, who had repeatedly seen my collection of spirit pictures, visited me and asked if I had continued my investigations since her absence from Washington. I showed many things, among them the photograph of a lady, in a white dress ornamented with a garland of flowers. Pointing to this picture I inquired: "Do you know this lady?" She somewhat hesitatingly denied. I queried: "Is she not one of your relatives?" She answered "No." Then I more pointedly asked: "Have you seen this lady perhaps occasionally in the mirror?" The lady laughed and wanted to know at what time I obtained this photograph. I told her the date, then the hour; she was utterly dumbfounded, and ultimately said she had been singing in a concert at Boston, Mass., at that very time and had been congratulated, after finishing her part, from all sides, they had never heard her sing so gloriously before.

Her explanation was that a spirit had been singing through her organism, while another spirit had brought her to me. I was of the same opinion. I wished to know if she wore such a dress at the time of her singing in Boston. She had not.

A few weeks after this conversation, she was invited to sing at the ball given in honor of the inauguration of President McKinley, where, in appreciation of her efforts, one of the managers removed a garland from a column in the Pension Office; a lady standing near, took hold of it and fastened it to the singer's white dress, making it appear exactly as it was shown in my photograph months ago. My friend was about to thank the stranger for her kindness, when her helper vanished from her view.

At Rochester, N. Y., as a visitor of the semi-centennial celebration of Spiritualism, I hastened to avail myself of the well-known spirit photographer, Frank N. Foster's mediumship. The results were highly satisfactory, so that I went again on a beautiful Sunday forenoon.

Mr. Foster, adjusting the camera, said, "I cannot see you—it seems there is a veil in front of you." As I had had similar experiences before, I urged him to go on and get what he could

I felt strong and joyous when I went to Mr. Foster's studio, but after this attempt to obtain a spirit photograph, I was so exhausted that I had to return to my hotel and rest on my bed, where I soon fell asleep(?) Before leaving Washington I had begged my daughter to go, if I should not have returned from Rochester at that time and hour, to the most excellent spirit photographer, with whom I had been experimenting for years, and she obtained a picture of my spirit, about four times as large as my body, standing back of my daughter.

I was perfectly conscious at Mr. Foster's when made invisible, or momentarily dematerialized.

The picture I obtained through friend Frank N. Foster shows the front of the back part of the chair on which I was sitting—and became invisible. Through and above the solid cross piece of the chair you can see my valued friend Powhattan, father of Pocohontas.

Immediately after my return from Rochester, I went to a materializing seance in Washington, when my long-departed son came, telling me: "Father, I brought your spirit from Rochester to sister."

These last two instances show at least that it was not thought that produced these photographs.

THE BETTER WAY.

Better by far it is to toil and struggle,
And bear life's burdens o'er a thorny way,
Than to sit idly down where gilded pleasure
Holdeth her court and cheats her votaries gay.

Brighter the wealth of heart, the gifts of feeling,
Though borne 'mid suffering penury and toil,
Than all the diamonds in the mines, that glisten,
And all the gold of Ind, or Klondike soil.

We cheat ourselves when earthly treasures win us
From our allegiance to the cause of truth,
And all sell our souls, or "make them aproned waiters"
To passions that but work us woe and ruth.

There are defeats that mar the plans we cherish,
Yet may be triumphs in the years to come.
And battle scars that we shall wear as trophies
Of victories won, when we have wandered home.

Special Notice.

The State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota has asked us to accept a second year of service as their missionaries. Before doing so we want to hear from every possible locality in the state and learn if they will try to arrange for meetings. Many localities have failed to arrange for us during the months we have labored in the state; and in many places we have no correspondent or name of a Spiritualist. Send us names everywhere in Minnesota. Let us have some grove-meetings during June and July.

These must be arranged at once in order to secure our services. Don't wait for opportunity; but create it! Address me at once.

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY.

BY W. J. COLVILLE.

Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume.

As several chapters are devoted to improved methods of education, the writer confidently expects that many parents, teachers and others who have charge of the young, or who are called upon to exercise supervision over the morally weak and mentally afflicted, will derive some help from the doctrines herewith promulgated.

A. Schopenhauer Essays.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75c.

CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life; Counsels and Maxims;; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE EVILS OF HYPNOTISM

USE OF MESMERISM AS AN ANESTHETIC CONDEMNED BY SOME SCHOOLS—EX-UNITED STATES SENATOR SELF-HYPNOTIZED FOR OPERATION—WOMAN UNDER SPELL BUYS SIX COPIES OF THE SAME BOOK.

The evolution of the word magnetism, says the Chicago Chronicle, was first into mesmerism, then into hypnotism, then into psychology, and finally into suggestive therapeutics, but the results obtained are one and the same always, which are one mind doing the thinking for another mind. The hypnotizer becomes a strong magnet and his subject becomes as steel filings before the magnetic current that flows from him. There are several schools for the study of human magnetism which hold that hypnotism is a form of hysteria and is at first a disease, which grows more and more pronounced as the subject is experimented with, hence the practice of it, even as a therapeutic agent in the cure of ailments, is most vigorously condemned. It is held by these schools that the subject is very much easier to handle the second time, a great deal easier the third time, and so on until he or she can be controlled at almost any distance and made to do the bidding of the hypnotist.

Only a few years ago a man was indicted in a Western State for murder. He admitted that he had a dim recollection of having done the deed, but he could assign no reason for doing it. In fact, he rather liked the murdered man. During the progress of the trial the startling fact was brought out that the prisoner had for a long time been under the hypnotic influence of a prominent citizen of the community who had propelled suggestions of murdering the victim into the mind of the accused so long and with such force that he finally committed the deed. The criminal records of all countries are full of cases of men and women having been influenced by stronger wills to commit crimes that in their normal condition would have been revolting to them. When the hypnotic subject passes under the influence of the "suggestion" he is to the hypnotizer what clay is to the potter, nor has he any more moral sense, force of character or conscience than the hypnotizer wills that he shall have.

Then there is such a thing as one hypnotizing himself. An ex-Senator of the United States from Missouri found it necessary to have a surgical operation performed on his nose. A deep incision was necessary. He mounted the operating chair and when the surgeon started to put him under the influence of ether he asked them to desist and let him alone for a few minutes. Presently he told them to go to work with their instruments. After the operation one of the surgeons asked him if the cutting was painful. He said it was not, but at times the knife felt like the gentle scratching of a pin. Then he informed the surgeon that he had mesmerized himself and also that he had been a student of psychic forces all his life. From this it would appear that the field of the influence of hypnotic effects is practically limitless.

HYPNOTIZED BY A BOOK AGENT.

A story comes from Milwaukee where a book agent is charged with using this subtle force to sell his goods. A Mrs. Hiles has been sued by the Bancroft Publishing Company for $600 for six copies of a book. Her defense is that the book agent hypnotized her. She says that Mr. Drew, the agent who sold the books, talked to her until her head ached and that he held out an agreement and pencil to her and told her to sign it. She avers that she tried to resist, but her mind was incapable of refusing, she being completely under a hypnotic spell.

A singular case of psychic energy manifesjation is reported at Wichita, Kan. William Mack, a harnessmaker, was arrested on charge of insanity, because he insisted that he was under the influence of a woman at Portland, Ore. He gives her name as Gertie Andrews and describes her as being a woman who makes her living by telling fortunes. He says she exercises a hypnotic influence over him and he is completely under her control. Mack's statement to the court is in substance as follows:

"I am not insane as you have charged. I am under the influence of a hypnotist, who exercises an evil spirit over me. I am afraid that unless the spell is taken away she will make me kill myself. She has already caused me to give up my money and sell my business. I have sent the money to her. Now I am penniless and charged with insanity. Lord knows I am not insane.

"I first met Gertie Andrews at San Francisco at the Baldwin Hotel, in the summer of 1891. She was a captivating woman and we fell in love. I had plenty of money then and asked her to marry me. She accepted and I was happy. We used to have little parties and she entertained the crowd by hypnotizing them. Her power in this line was wonderful. Time passed and I came back to Wichita and she went back to Portland. My business dwindled and when she came to Wichita on a visit four weeks ago I found myself unable to keep my promise of marriage. She was very angry. The night she left we went into a restaurant near the Santa Fe depot and ordered supper. We were in a little room alone and after we commenced eating she began to talk of hypnotism. I knew that she intended to hypnotize me, but I was even then under her power.

KIDNAPED BY A WOMAN.

"Several days later when I came to my proper senses I found myself in a cell in the police station at Denver. The police said I was crazy. The woman had kidnaped me. That night she came to the station house to see me and secure my release. Then she forced me by her power to telegraph to Wichita for money. I told her I had none.

"'Yes you have,' she said. 'Tell them you are ill and have to have it.'

"I did so and when the money came she took it and skipped out. I returned here, and guess I have acted crazy ever since. It is the curse she has placed upon me. I cannot get rid of it. Every now and then I feel it come upon me, and I guess it makes me act like a villain. I pray to God every night to take away the curse, but it remains. I wish the officers would find her and make her take this curse away.

"She tells me to do things and I cannot help doing them. If she were to tell me to kill myself I fear I should obey. Oh! this curse is something awful!"

Mack's actions are very strange at times. He is a fair representation of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. In the cell of the county jail where he has been confined he acts in various moods and is the cause for much thinking among the medical people of Wichita. In the forenoon he is generally mild and wants to read the Bible continually. At night the demon shows itself and he paces back and forth in his cell, tearing his hair and calling upon Gertie to quit torturing him. He has torn a number of beds and chairs into small bits. But when the spell passes away he does not remember that anything has occurred.

The sheriff has sent inquiries to Oregon and no such woman is known there. However, several people in Wichita claim to have seen him in company with such a person in the town. It is known by his friends that he sent much money away to a "lady friend," and it is known that he went to Denver and wired here for a large sum of money, which was sent. In the meantime the judge sits on his chair and looks down at Mack, who is brought every morning for observation and insists that he is not insane and that he shall be turned loose that afternoon. But when the jailer goes down to unlock Mack's cell he is frightened away by his wild actions and loud cursing. The unfortunate man paces up and down his cell murmuring in despair:

"Oh! my God, Gertie, why don't you remove this awful curse? Don't you know I am dying?"

A remarkable case of an insane girl having been returned to reason by hypnosis comes from Paterson, N. J. The operation, or, to use the technical term, the hypnosis, was performed in the German Hospital in Paterson. The subject was a young woman of good family. She was sent to the hospital by her relatives in a condition of insanity brought on by disgrace consequent upon her misplaced confidence in a young man's promises. She had been sent to the hospital, not in the hope that she could be cured of her mental disorder, but merely that the customary formalities of State medical examination by commissioners in lunacy could be made preparatory to committing her to an asylum.

She was insane. The physicians of the hospital agreed to that, and unless some unusual treatment could be had there was no escape for her from confinement in an institution. They determined to try hypnosis on the young woman and they did so, and with results which, if they are to be believed in their entirety, mark an epoch in the advancement of psychical accomplishment.

In four days the young woman was cured of her insanity by the complete eradication from her mind of all memory of her disgrace. At the end of that time she left the hospital in good health and otherwise completely unchanged from her normal self except, it is asserted, in these particulars:

She had completely forgotten her disgrace, as much as if it had never happened.

HAS FORGOTTEN THE MAN.

She had lost all memory of the man who had been responsible for her trouble.

She met the man on the street, not once, but many times, without recognizing him any more than if he had been a perfect stranger to her.

She did not recognize his photograph, which was in her home, as that of one she had ever known.

The sight of presents he had given to her aroused in her no recollection whatever.

She was mentally as completely removed from that sad occurrence in her life as if it had been the lot of another person.

These are the facts in the case as observed by scientific men, who were cognizant of it both before and after the hypnosis. Those who do not believe in hypnotism may doubt that the cure was effected wholly in the manner described, but that it was effected, and that, as far as the critical observations of the medical men interested could determine, no other means was used, seems to be beyond doubt.

The methods employed by the physicians to accomplish this result are interesting. They used the latest modern scientific method of producing "sleep suggestions of forgetfulness." Four days were required to effect the cure, and it is understood that on at least two of the above days the suggestions were communicated to her on more than one occasion.

The young woman was thrown into a deep sleep. While in that sleep the operator gave to her the suggestion of forgetfulness. These are given by repetition on the part of the operator of the idea of forgetfulness until it is thoroughly impressed on the passive mind of the subject.

MENTAL EASE SUGGESTED.

The operator would repeat the sentences: "Forget your trouble," "Discard all thoughts of evil from your mind," "Cease to worry about anything," many, many times, while focusing his will on the object to be attained until the patient gradually began to let slip her hold upon the vivid impression she had of her disgrace and became more and more oblivious of it. Then the suggestions would become:

"You are quite well," "You have no troubles," "You are going home." Four days of this, which meant the hardest and most trying work on the part of the operator and a deep, hypnotic state of passive receptivity on the part of the young woman, completed the cure; and, according to the testimony of those who have been familiar with the case, the young woman is, except as to the lapse in memory on this one subject, quite as she was before.

Hypnotists say this cure, while the most remarkable because of its striking character, differs from the results obtained in a multitude of cases only in the greater number of ideas included and the consequent greater brain area which needed to be hypnotized.

The scientific explanation of hypnosis, according to the most modern theories on the subject, is that the brain is composed of a multitude of small cells, or bodies. These cell bodies are unconnected except by contiguity, and are not, as formerly was believed, of a fibrous nature, which it was thought made all parts of the brain intercommunicative.

It is found to be possible by means of suggestion on the part of the hypnotist to cause these cell bodies to contrast and become more isolated one from another. This retraction, by means of its consequent separation, takes that particular cell body or set of cell bodies out of connection with its neighbors, and thus for the time being cuts off that particular line of sensation from the general consciousness.

COMPARED TO TELEGRAPHY.

The action of suggestion or hypnosis on the cell bodies is compared to that of a telegraph operator who cuts out his particular line or instrument from a certain circuit.

In the case of the young woman in Paterson it is asserted that the hypnotist was able to bring about retraction in that portion of the brain where these disordered notions found lodgment. The suggestions of the operator caused the retraction in the cell bodies thus affected, and by this means disconnected all memory of the disgrace from the young woman's consciousness.

The explanation of hypnotists is thus understood when they say that the cure of the young woman does not differ in nature from a mere benumbing, say, of one finger, a common experiment in hypnosis. In the latter instance, perhaps one cell body would be disconnected, to use the popular term, while in the case of the young woman a variety of cell bodies, corresponding to the great variety of thoughts and emotions commingled in her suffering, had to be cut out.

The story of one Sir Henry Westwood Cooper gives still another phase of hypnosis. He is a convict in the State prison at San Quentin, Cal., and this is a list of a few of his alleged doings in which hypnotic influences are said to have been exercised: Married Miss Bertha Young at Brisbane, Australia, in 1896, and was charged with defrauding her family; induced Miss Ethel Maud Champaign, of Stanton, Canada, to elope with him in May, 1897; perpetrated some peculiar frauds at Chicago in 1897, according to the police reports; in August, 1897, persuaded Landlord John P. Gallagher, of the Langham Hotel, San Francisco, to accept a forged draft for $85,000; planned in August, 1897, to elope with Mrs. Georgie Fanning, a Langham Hotel waitress, promising a settlement of $250,000; induced seven desperate convicts at San Quentin to join him in a scheme of murderous revolt, so that by informing the prison officials of the plot he could win favor and possibly freedom; caused the prison officers on March 3 to dismiss Guard Shields, SUSCEPTIBILITY TO SUGGESTION.

A. C. Halphide, A. B., M. D., of Chicago, is an enthusiastic advocate of suggestive therapeutics, or hypnotism, but he admits that the chief symptom of hypnosis is the increased susceptibility to suggestion, which means weak-mindedness. He says this is often found where fixation of the eyelids is lacking, although this is one of the first and most regular phenomena. In some subjects in hypnosis the movements are quick and easy, while in others they are slow and labored. Not only speech but music has a marked suggestive influence upon the hypnotized. Sad music, like a sad story, will make them sad and tears will well up into the eyes and trickle down their cheeks. The same is true of lively music or a humorous story; they will go into ecstacies of mirth over them. The fact that they are incapable of other than deductive reasoning renders them liable to serious deceptions and furnishes an explanation for many of the dangers of hypnotism. The individuality of the person may be changed; suggest that he is another person and he will believe it and comport himself accordingly. Post hypnotic suggestions are readily accepted to be carried out at an appointed signal. The voluntary muscular system is readily controlled in many subjects. They have willingly and unresistingly delivered themselves into the control of another, and if you suggest that they cannot move they cannot. The same results follow in the sensations. They can be made to feel warm or cold, hungry or thirsty, to see, hear, smell, taste or feel anything. They can be made to feel well or sick, to feel pain or to be relieved from it. The physiological actions of the involuntary organs may be just as well and as certainly affected. Many instances of such results are at hand. The action of the heart may be increased or diminished, the character of the respiration changed, the functional activities of the stomach, the liver, the kidneys and the intestinal canal affected at will.

HIS SPIRIT WIFE.

She Prevented Him from Committing Suicide.

"If there is any man in this city who has the idea of quitting this earth by setting his time of exit instead of waiting for it bravely, I want just to say to him, 'Hold on, and you'll get better luck than you ever dreamed of.'"

The man who was speaking was in a down-town business office, talking with three acquaintances whom he had met by appointment, coming from the West to do so.

He had the hall-mark of a prosperous man, but around the eyes were the broken lines where sometimes mental trouble had done its work and left its signature, that all might see who was the maker of the etching.

"I went over to Brooklyn to-day," continued the man; "I haven't been there in many years." Then he became silent and his friends waited. Again he talked.

"Perhaps you will care to hear a story of a man who has had a strange experience, whose life was saved by the most undecipherable miracle possible.

"I came to New York," he began, "about twenty years ago, after having seen my old father ruined by a scoundrel, and all I possessed dumped into the financial hole that held all my family worldly possessions. I had no idea what to do until a wealthy typefounder who had been helped in his struggling days by my father came forward and made an offer to help me, so that, he said, I might help my father. He proposed that I let him set me up in business in New York, where he said I could easily clear $10,000 a year running a printing office; he would furnish all the type, cases, and necessary stock, and I could pay him 6 per cent on the investment and pay up for the plant as fast as I could. I was doubtful of the chance that a perfect stranger in so big a city would stand with those composing rooms already established, but he braced me up by saying that about all the printers and magazine publishers, as well as the trade journal men, were in his power as he had mortgages on their stock, and that he could throw enough business into my hands to keep me going till I got well established. So I moved my family to Brooklyn, although there were only two of us to come. My wife was a Down East girl, who had always been one of those mother's girls; I guess she loved me as well as any wife ever did, but she loved her mother, who was a saint, with an affection just as tender if it was different. So when we were established in our new home, she must have suffered acutely from loneliness and strangeness, but she never let me know it.

"I ran that composing room four years, and if I go to hell when I die I ought in common justice to have four years taken off my sentence, for I was in hell every minute of the time. I had the plant all going, a good foreman, a full force of compositors, the latest and best type, cuts, rules, ornaments, and all I lacked to get that ten thousand a year was a contract. I asked the typefounder's advice as to where I should get jobs. He told me to look for work. 'Go out and walk the city over and find work,' said my capitalist; 'a man can't get business in this city sitting in his office waiting for somebody to hunt him up.' So I walked the city over, and at last got a contract for a clothing catalogue but I had to have some one be responsible for the finishing of the work on time. I asked my benefactor, the type-founder, to secure me in this matter. I went down to his office and waited a couple of hours to see him. I told him how I was placed and asked his aid. He turned suddenly round in his office chair and said:

"'Look here, you haven't been trying to get work from Riderich, have you? That won't do; they are customers of Rule & Gothic's composing rooms, and that firm buys all their type of me. I can't have you trying to get jobs anywhere that will interfere with work done by firms who buy their stuff of me. I couldn't sell a stickful of type to one of my customers if you did, for they all know I am backing you, and would throw me down for once and all.'

"I knew he sold more printer's supplies in the city than every other founder and I saw my downfall, but did not throw up the job then and there as I ought to have done. Well, I went on, getting some carriage circulars, a few publications, a little work from new concerns and some overflow work from one of the leading magazines, and so I struggled along, one of the most miserable men in this great city. I couldn't pay anything toward my plant or even the interest. My wife never saw a new dress, or coat or hat. Often I had to borrow the price of a ride over to my home. Down East my poor old father and mother died and were spared the knowledge of my failure. I used to tell my wife I wanted to take my breakfast in New York so that she might not have to rise so early; I never had a breakfast those last months. I ate my lunch at the cheapest place in Pearl street, and told my wife to have only supper at night as I ate a hearty dinner at the noon hour.

"One day my benefactor sent for me. He said I was making a complete failure of business; he reckoned I hadn't any push; he named over dozens of composing rooms that had made their owners wealthy, and I am glad to think many of them failed later on and nipped the old man out of some thousands in their downfall. He said he wasn't going to back the thing any longer, and the sooner I closed out the better. I begged that man to give me six months more chance. Finally he said he would give me four weeks more, and think over it. But three weeks later, when I went to my office, I found there a force of men taking out the furnishings, type cases, stock and so forth. I inquired what it all meant, and was told by one in apparent authority: 'The old man's ordered this place closed up, and the stock and furnishings taken out.'

"I sat there watching the men in a dazed silence; when they had closed the place I went out and wandered around till the time I usually went home. When I got off the car there stood before our door the deep hooded carriage of a doctor. I knew what it meant,

"My wife died the next day but one. The baby lived. I never looked at it, and believe I never thought of it without hatred. Her mother took my wife East to bury her at the old home; she took the baby, too. I resolved to put myself out of the way. I argued back and forth with myself, thinking, as my Christian mother had taught me, that a suicide is debarred from immortality; but that fact did not deter me. My plans were made. I would jump from a ferry boat and soon be beyond further agony. As I went on the boat I swear I saw my wife just in advance of me. She turned her face towards me and smiled, and I followed her and stood beside her. I did not speak to her, for I seemed weak and dumb. We left the boat and I followed her on and on till we came to a railroad station. Every once in a while she would turn her face to me, for she was always in advance, and the tenderness and pity of it were unspeakably manifest. I followed her onto a train. When I saw my wife beckon to me I left the train, she always going a trifle in advance. We were in a country village; there was one long street, and short streets crossing it at irregular intervals. I followed my wife down one of these cross streets, which ended in a lane, at the terminus of which was a barred gate opening into a green meadow, across which I could see glimpses of a river. We were soon there by its border. My wife gave me one look, it seemed full of sorrow and reproach, and then with a quick, strong leap, she cast herself into the stream. I plunged in after her, calling wildly. As I struck the water I at first sank, unable to swim from weakness. All at once life seemed valuable to me; I struggled desperately, and fought for my life; I somehow reached the bank, and the last I remember was of sinking, sprawling upon the turf. The last thought I had was "Here is a great green field and a running river," such as she longed for in that close, troublous, oppressive house she called home during those dreadful years.

"I came to my senses in a hospital four weeks later. It was in this hospital that I met the man who, when we both left the institution, offered to take me West with him and give me employment. You all know here how I prospered. When I came East this time my daughter wanted to come, as she said, to see the house where she was born. We went to-day to Brooklyn to see it. I could scarcely find it."

Here he buttoned up his top-coat and refused to talk deals and prices, for, said he:

"I've no time to-day, now; I have to get into my togs and take my daughter out to a luncheon with my girl for three years past."—New York Sun.

MY YEARS GO SWIFTLY BY.

My years go swiftly by,
And slowly, surely I can trace
The lines of care upon my face,
And in my hair the silver gray,
In sober sadness grimly stray,
And Time with careful tenderness
Lingers near the fond caress,
As though an angel friend were nigh.

My years are ebbing by,
And friends are leaving one by one,
My hour-glass sands are nearly run,
I hear as though cold lips had said
"The silent years are not dead,
In Memory's urnman's gifted soul
Keeps all her treasures safe and whole
Immortal in the sky."

My years go swiftly by,
Old hearts estranged turn once more to me,
As I recall the past remorsefully,
Their eyes that chill me, and averted glance,
And look upon me, perchance,
As in the old familiar way;
But who could war with unconscious clay,
The unseen dwellers of the sky.

My years go swiftly by,
I greet the absent ones of the long ago.
Adown Time's swift current's noiseless flow
My bark moves towards the distant goal,
The garden-land of the soul.
O hearts estranged! for ye I plead
The world's sweet comfort and meed,
Where love and friendship never die,
Eternal in the sky.

THE MAYER FUND.

Plan Proposed to Raise the Needed Amount.

To the Editor:—The Progressive Thinker, No. 544, contains an appeal from our worthy brother and true representative, Lyman C. Howe. It relates to the "Mayer fund."

It appears that there is still unpledged the sum of three thousand dollars. If that was secured, it would make the definite sum of ten thousand dollars to meet the generous offer made by Mr. Mayer more than a year ago for the purpose of advancing the cause of spiritual truth.

This ten thousand dollars raised by free-will offerings will be invested to secure a commodious and beautiful spiritual temple in the city of Washington, D. C., estimated at the low figure of twenty-five thousand dollars, Mr. Mayer donating fifteen thousand dollars for our benefit.

In reading the article from Brother Howe, and thinking it over, the desire became strong to help make this enterprise a success. But how?

We have heard it presented by some of our ablest inspired speakers from the public rostrum. It has occupied space in our spiritual papers. It has been ardently supported by the wise, the pure and the good in all classes among Spiritualists.

And it has been opposed by some who felt that we did not need any such outlay of money in Washington, D. C. If the Spiritualists in that city desired a "home," let them provide one as "we do here."

Doubtless each individual in the discussion of this matter has expressed this honest convictions, and we feel bound to respect them, even though our action should be contrary to this decision. Brother Howe speaks of the Baptists of Buffalo, where one congregation raised by subscription $23,000 at one session. It seemed to have a marvelous effect upon the old spiritual leader, because he breaks out in a deep-toned declaration, "Oh! that we were Baptists! How easy it would be to raise the ten thousand dollars, to secure the fifteen more as offered by Mr. Mayer." One seems to see the old battle-scarred veteran, who for forty years has contended with "the world, the flesh and the devil," which flourish in the field of orthodoxy. And now, in his zeal, and ardent desire to secure that which will confer lasting good upon us as a people, like Richard III. cries out, in tones above the din of conflict, "A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!"

"Oh, that we were Baptists!" This sentence coming from the source it does, indicates the earnest desire of our worthy brother, that we act up to our duty and privilege and avail ourselves of this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

In the many calls for aid in this commendable enterprise, the class of persons who form the majority of our people has had no direct appeal made to them, and our purpose in this simple effort is to make it.

We say commendable enterprise. Surely the liberal, yea, munificent act on the part of Mr. Mayer is one to be emulated by all good Spiritualists who are wealthy and should be responded to by all so-called poor, as far as their means will admit.

It would be absurd for a man in Mr. Mayer's position, and business qualifications to enter into such a deal if he sought personal benefits, or financial advantage.

As an individual he conveys to the N. S. A. a valuable piece of property of which they stand in need, and at a reduction of fifteen thousand dollars from its market value. Why should he do this? If it is not for the benefit of Spiritualists throughout our land, to whom will the benefit flow?

"But, it is deeded to the N. S. A!" Well, my brother or my sister, to whom should the property be given?

Suppose that Mr. Mayer makes bequest of $25,000 instead of $15,000 to the Spiritualists as a people, and to be paid to each in cash, and suppose we number 2,500,000, we would not be very greatly benefited by receiving one cent, and still it is a very large amount for one good man to give.

Now let us look at this matter as one which affects each and every one of us who are Spiritualists. Think of it a moment. Can we dispense with the services of the N. S. A? Would we be as well prepared to meet the cares and trials of earth-life if that organization were dissolved, and its efforts and influence for our good destroyed?

What have the people received who have been brought under the influence of spiritual truth through the labors of the band of missionaries sent out by the N. S. A? What do they receive?

Life! And the knowledge of the fact of spirit return, and reliable spirit intercourse. Is this of any import to us? Do we not desire that people who are now in the bonds of orthodox slavery, shall be brought to the light and freedom of the truth? How many missionaries went forth bearing the words of life, liberty and eternal progress prior to the inauguration of the N. S. A?

Should we not rejoice at the news of Mr. Mayer's kind thought to aid those who were bearing the light of life into the habitations of darkness and superstition?

He says to us plainly, kindly, Come, brother or sister, give ten cents towards the cause you dearly love and I will add to it fifteen for the same purpose.

It seems to us, with our limited perception of the great problem of rescuing humanity from self enslavement, and the bonds of superstition in which many of us were born, that spiritual truth is the only power that will or can save mankind from disappointment, degradation and moral darkness.

Now it is a fact well established, that the object of the N. S. A., indeed, their mission, is to bear the light of spiritual truth through the labors of their missionaries whom they equip and send forth to the needy localities, without money and without price.

Thus the gospel of spiritual truth is being carried to many hearts, homes, and communities that would not receive it were it not for the efforts of the N. S. A.

Are the salaries and perquisites of the members of this body so lucrative, and their prerogatives so royal, as to be a source of danger to the integrity and probity of candidates seeking the distinctive honors conferred upon them?

Should we as a people refuse to aid our good Brother Mayer who proposes to present a home or dwelling place for the N. S. A?

Surely, no sane person would think that intelligent Spiritualists would look upon it as the Vatican at Washington, D. C?

Is not this organization entitled to some token of respect, confidence, admiration or affection for its labors in the past years? Is it within the bounds of possibility to organize a society, whose field of labor is so wide, and run as smoothly as some guild which is dominated by an ecclesiastical court presided over by a mitered parasite?

This much abused organization, through the misunderstanding of many who have not entered into their object and their motives, has sent forth no irate "bulls," although some may have been made by zeal, which did not at all accord with the knowledge they now possess.

The class which we referred to in the forepart of this article, we designate as the "laboring class." The writer belongs to this efficient, stalwart, and honorable class, though still unpopular in what is termed the higher walks of life—but its history needs no apology when introduced.

The mighty forests of the western world fell beneath the strokes of honest labor.

Oceans and great lakes are traversed by floating palaces, and leviathans of commerce, which move with the speed of modern progress, set in motion by the grimy hand of honest labor, guided by the active brain of the sturdy artisan, whose fruitful mind and deft hand has cleft the mountain range and spanned the foaming torrent with trusses of steel. Our country, the center of active life was bought with the life blood of honest labor which is ever ready to respond to the call of duty whether in the community where they reside, or on the field of carnage, to defend our flag, and perpetuate our free institutions. It is to this class of noble and self-sustaining manhood and womanhood this appeal is made.

My brother, my sister Spiritualist will we be justified as a class, who are reaping rich rewards from our even limited knowledge of our beautiful philosophy, if we fail to do what seems to be in this matter of the "Mayer fund," our plain duty?

Time and space forbid details, but ask yourselves the question, Has there not been great good accomplished by the N. S. A?

Have they not sent able and pure-minded, intelligent teachers into hundreds of places where our philosophy would never have been taught, only through this effective effort?

Will it be wise in us, who are endeavoring to build up spiritual manhood and womanhood, to stand idly by and refuse, forget or neglect to render so slight a service as that required to secure to the N. S. A. the gift of the home which they have merited?

As we are one in spirit, in the one great household of life and progress, with one hope well established of immortality, it is our home, the gift of Mr. Mayer is to us all, both rich and poor, learned and illiterate.

It is a matter of only a few years, and perhaps days, when some of us will view this subject from the spirit-side of existence.

Standing there suppose we realize the fact that through a lack of interest on the part of many, ourselves included, the liberal offer was withdrawn, will the knowledge of this failure be a source of comfort and peace to those of us who pass out of the body?

Suppose we meet in the spirit realm, some ardent worker and a member of the N. S. A. while here, could we greet them with the hearty expression which characterizes the sturdy workmen and women of our country?

I fear we could not!

Will the working people of the United States who are Spiritualists permit me to make a proposition? The end and aim is to secure, on or before the 15th day of June, 1900, the sum of $3,000 to be known as the "Labor fund," to be added to the $7,000 already secured to meet the $15,000 given by Mr. Mayer.

It requires only 15,000 subscribers at 20 cents each, to secure that which you will be gratefully proud of in the years to come.

Send post office order for twenty cents to Mrs. M. T. Longley, secretary of the N. S. A., Washington, D. C.

Friends, do this at once, if you possibly can. If you have not the money to spare this "pay" send it next "pay." But send your written pledge for the amount to be paid on or before the 15th of June, 1900, so that the secretary can act upon your pledge.

Hoping, dear friends, that you will see the necessity of immediate action, and that you will receive the suggestion in the spirit of kindness in which it is made, I will go and do likewise.

In hope of a glorious immortality, through the power of spiritual progression, I remain, fraternally yours, Dowagiac, Mich. C. F. COLE.

The To-Morrow of Death.

---OR THE---

Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKEE.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist, he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens o the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

WHAT WOULD FOLLOW

The Effacement of Christianity? By George Jacob Holyoake. This is a most valuable contribution to Freethought literature. Bound in paper with good likeness of author. Price, 10 cents; twelve copies for $1.00.

The Blue Laws of Connecticut.

Taken from the Code of 1650, and the public records of the colony of Connecticut previous to 1655, as printed in a compilation of the earliest laws and orders of the general court of Connecticut; also an account of the persecution of witches and Quakers in New England. A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times. Fulfilling Prophecy.

The Daily Press, published in English at Hong Kong, China, made this important statement in its editorial columns a few weeks ago:

"Many missionaries, under pretext of preaching Christianity, come to China to buy properties, to trade, to excite disorders, to make money, and to gain political influence. The greatest and most disastrous rebellion, that of the Taipings, is recorded in history as having been fermented by the missionaries. Almost all the wars and serious complications which China has had with foreign powers have been caused only by those who pretended to teach the gospel of peace and forbearance."

The Truth Seeker, in quoting the above extract, well said: "There is wonderful agreement of testimony that Christian missionaries are fulfilling at least one prediction ascribed to Christ, namely, 'he came not to bring peace but a sword.'"

Reconstruction of the Temple of Luxor.

Mention was made in these columns some months ago, of the overthrow of several of the great columns at Karnak while workmen were engaged in restoring the magnificent ruins of the great temple to their original splendor. It is a pleasure to learn the original purpose has not been abandoned because of the calamity; on the contrary a large force of laborers, mechanics and artists, under the superintendence of M. Legant, are now at work replacing the fallen columns, and supplying anew the wrecks time and the destroying hand of man has made. During the process of removing the debris for replacing the fallen columns a city gate was discovered, bearing date of the 18th dynasty, about B. C. 1703. A large tomb in perfect preservation, dating from the 11th dynasty, B. C. 3,064, was found among the ruins of Thebes, which was demolished by Cambyses, about B. C. 525, he having vented his rage on the monuments and objects of worship, being himself a Zoroastrian, and disgusted with the worship of the bull Apis by the Egyptians.

Post Mortem Scarecrow.

Catholics refused St. George Mivart, the scientist, burial in consecrated ground. Though still a member of that church, they even declined Christian service at his funeral, so his body was deposited in the catacombs underlying the chapel in Kensal Green Cemetery. It is not probable Dr. Mivart grieves at the disposition of his remains; but this action of the church extended to the dead is designed to hold the living in restraint. It is a sort of post mortem scarecrow, as they used to bury suicides at the forks of roads with a stake driven through the body, hoping by such dishonor to the dead to prevent others taking a short cut away from the ills of earth.

Polygamous Protestantism.

Mrs. Gage, in her learned work, "Woman, Church and State," p. 398, tells us that Luther, the great Protestant reformer, asked leave of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, to marry a second wife, the first wife, Margaret of Savoy, still living. The Landgrave called together a synod of six principal reformers—Melancthon and Bucer among them—who in joint consultation decided:

"As the Bible nowhere condemns polygamy, and as it has been invariably practiced by the highest dignitaries of the church, such marriages are legitimate."

And Luther himself:

"I confess for my part that if a man wishes to marry two or more wives, I cannot forbid him, nor is his conduct repugnant to the Holy Scriptures."

That was Christian Protestantism at its inception. The Scriptures, God's Holy Word, did not prohibit either polygamy or slavery, therefore both were justifiable, and both were sustained by the clergy until liberal thought came to the relief of both the woman and the slave; then the church claimed the credit for the emancipation of each.

It is objected by some Spiritualists who are still clinging to the skirts of the church, that we dwell too much on the past; that more attention should be given to matters of to-day.

The errors of the past are guides to the future. If the church was false to truth in the beginning and all the way down the centuries until it learned from unbelievers, or from experience, then its teachings are not of God, and its claim in that direction is false, and is unworthy of credit in anything.

Now a Christian Party.

At a conference held in Chicago last December a project for organizing a United Christian party, to control the politics of the nation was discussed, and was referred to a General Assembly which was to convene in Rock Island May 1. That body, professing to voice the will of all Christian denominations, were in session as per announcement. They first discussed the proposition:

"The Principles of Christ: Shall we apply them in concrete form to the State and National Government, through a Christian Political Union or a Party?"

A unanimous vote in the affirmative was the result. Then the name United Christian Party was adopted, in place of Christian Political Union, as originally suggested. On May 2 the platform was adopted. It declares, as reported by press dispatches:

"The time has arrived when the eternal principles of justice, mercy and love as exemplified in the life and teachings of Christ should be embodied in the Constitution of the nation, and applied in concrete form to every function of the government. It deprecates immoral laws, such as require the desecration of the Christian Sabbath, unscriptural marriage and divorce, and the licensing, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages.

"The platform further declares for the adoption of the system of legislation known as the initiation and referendum, together with proportionate representation and imperative mandate; declares for the political, social and economic equality of the sexes; declares against war, and demands arbitration of national and international disputes; declares for the immediate abolishment of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages, and demands the enactment of laws prohibiting the sale of tobacco to minors. It also demands the daily reading of the Bible in the public schools and institutions of learning controlled by the State; declares for government ownership of public utilities, and the election of President, Vice-President and United States Senators by direct vote of the people."

The object of these malcontents is really to undo what was done by the fathers of the republic, which divorced church and state and set up a secular government—"a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," as Lincoln put it, instead of a theocracy directed by priests pretendedly established by God, with Jesus Christ as king, and the old Jew book, with all its barbarous customs, as the written law.

The movement in effect, if successfully carried out in detail, will revive the Middle Ages, restore the Inquisition with its torture chambers, stakes of flame, confiscation of estates to churches, the burning of heretics and witches, and the suppression of every noble impulse, unless approved in a Christian Star Chamber. Indeed, it is very questionable if the tyrannous rule of Catholicism in the day of its greatest power, will not be rivaled; for each faction will be ambitious to lead its neighbor in carrying into execution extreme measures. Its sop to women, to the peace party, and to the temperance reformers, is a modern concoction plundered from infidels and Spiritualists, with hope of gaining strength from the outside. If sincerely desirous of advancing either of these reforms they would best succeed by silence.

The Convention closed its labors by nominating Rev. S. C. Swallow, of Harrisburg, Pa., for President, and John G. Woolley, of Chicago, Vice-President.

The way to defeat this brutal scheme of oppression will be by counter action, giving full support to any party which will co-operate in defeating the marplots. It will not do to delay until we are bound hand and foot before measures are taken to defeat this device of demagogues in the name of religion, to rule or ruin. All the non-evangelical sects, the Spiritualists, Agnostics, and unbelievers generally, will unite in such hostile movement, as will the Baptists, and several of the minor orthodox sects. If the issue is made there is no other way than to meet it with vigor, subordinating all others to this one question.

Collectors of Junk.

The energy displayed by the dear sisters to advance the cause which for ages held them in thrall, is worthy a better cause. The last grand enterprise to advance the Redeemer's kingdom is an organization in cities to gather up all the waste rubber, in the form of overshoes, boots, garden hose, bicycle tires, in fact any old cast-off rubber article—perhaps fine tooth combs and dental plates—the same to be sold as junk, the proceeds to be used for missionary purposes. Committees of long-faced and worthy ladies are to go from door to door begging this waste, and it is hoped they will be abundantly supplied.

This old rubber, having saved a multitude of souls, will come back to the donor, when properly "devesomething," in the shape of new goods, so nicely wrought by genius the eye cannot detect its shoddy character, so the user will only learn by practical experience of the deception by the worthlessness of the product.

Though shoddy is the outcome of this collection of the ladies, and shoddy manufacturers will be greatly profited, yet it is hoped no one will suggest that the cause proposed to be advanced by the collection of material for shoddy, is itself a worthless shoddy.

The Japanese Way.

"The Japanese, in launching ships, use no wine, but hang over the ship's prow a large pasteboard cage full of birds. The moment the ship is afloat a man pulls a string, when the cage opens and the birds fly away, making the air alive with music and the whirr of wings."—New York Post.

The Christian way was borrowed from Paganism. They anointed the prow of the ship with oil, and gave it a name, exactly as was the custom in naming their idols. After Roman paganism was metamorphosed into what is now known as Christianity, and wine became symbolic of the blood of a crucified God, then the fermented juice of the grape was substituted for the oil in christening. In more recent times seafaring men in some instances have used good old Scotch whiskey, and in its absence Bourbon will do, in naming their ships. The Japanese custom in giving freedom to the birds, and they in song, is a delightful one which Americans would do well to borrow.

A Heathen Philosopher and a Challenge.

Seneca taught: "The body is only the covering of the soul. With the dissolution of the mortal part of man the freed spirit will discover the concealed secrets of Nature. Darkness will be dispelled and irradiated with light and glory, a glory without a shadow, a glory that shall surround the spirit and enable it to look down and see day and night beneath. Now we cannot lift our eyes toward the sun without being dazzled. What shall we do when we behold the divine light in its illustrious original?

"God never repents of his first counsels. It is not with our heavenly as with our earthly father. God thought of us and provided for us, before he made us; for unto him all future events are present. Man was not the work of chance. He naturally aspires to the contemplation of heaven and divine mysteries.

"We must labor and climb the hill, if we desire to arrive at virtue, whose seat is upon the top of it.

"He who masters avarice, and is truly good stands firm against ambition. He looks upon his last hour, not as a punishment, but as the equity of a common fate. He who subdues his carnal lusts shall easily keep himself untainted.

"He who dies of old age does no more than go to bed when he is weary. Death is the test of life, and it is that only which discovers what we are, and distinguishes betwixt ostentation and virtue.

"Let us look for death in all places, and at all times. We can never study that point too much. It is a blessed thing to dispatch the business of life before we die, and then to expect death in the possession of a happy life. He is the great man who is willing to die when life is pleasant to him. An honest life is not a greater good than an honest death.

"It is childish to go out of the world groaning and wailing as we came into it. Our bodies must be thrown away, as the secundine that wraps up the infant, the other being only the cover of the soul."

These quotations are made at random from Seneca's Morals, found among thousands of others equally pointed, on every variety of subjects, each showing that the same questions which now agitate the public mind engrossed the attention of the wise in that earlier age when Christians seem to think all were groveling in heathen darkness.

Again and again we challenge churchmen to point out a single rite, ceremony, sacrament, holiday or holy day which had not its parallel in what they call heathendom, and that long in advance of the Christian era.

Has Woman a Soul?

A correspondent inquired a while ago what Council it was that declared "Woman is soulless?" We replied we were without information, on the subject.

Mrs. Gage, in her admirable work, "Woman, Church and State," a publication everybody, and particularly women, should read, tells us:

"Theologians found the nature of woman a prolific subject of discussion, a large party classing her among brutes without soul or reason." Continuing, on p. 56 she says:

"As early as the 6th century a Council at Macon—A. D. 585—59 Bishops taking part, devoted its time to a discussion of the question, 'Does woman possess a soul?' Upon one side it was argued woman should not be called 'homo;' upon the opposite side she should, because the Scriptures declare God created man male and female, and because Jesus, son of a woman, is called the son of man. * * A thousand years after it was contended the women of America belonged to the brute creation, possessing neither souls nor reason."

In a note she says; and quotes Dictionaire Feodab, Paris, 1819, for authority:

"Old Christian theologians for a long time disputed upon the nature of females; a numerous party classed them among brutes, having neither soul nor reason. They called a Council to arrest the progress of this heresy. It was contended the women of Peru and other countries of America were without soul or reason. The first Christians made a distinction between men and women. Catholics would not permit them to sing in church."

Treated as a slave, pledged by her marriage vow to "obey" her husband, classed by him as a brute without a soul, subject to correction by "a whip no larger than his thumb," and to every indignity tyrant man saw fit to inflict on her under the operation of Christian laws, and yet "woman's greatest glory has come to her through the beneficence of the church," said a clergyman the other day.

Age for Creed Making Is Past.

Ten years ago an attempt was made to revise the Presbyterian creed. Three-fourths of the Presbyteries, of which there are scattered over the world 232, representing 7,657 churches and one million of communicants, yet the measure was defeated, not because a change was not desirable at that time, but because they could not agree on the details of such revision. A decade has passed; a revision is no longer called for, but an entire new creed is demanded.

The General Assembly of Presbyterians of the United States meet in St. Louis on the 17th inst., and the Creed, otherwise Confession of Faith, will again come up and demand a hearing. The same discordant elements as in the past will be there, with the prestage of 250 years favoring the antiquated dogmas of Christianity. At the base of all of them the fall of man from his first estate is met with. Then follows the total depravity of the entire race, save righteous Noah's family, who were all swept away by a universal flood, yet sin continued, Noah got drunk, and the Almighty Creator, notwithstanding his great power, could devise no other way to save man from his fallen condition than to beget a son by a Jewish maiden, and require the death of that son on a cross to appease his great anger. And then that salvation was only on condition the sinner believed this son was God himself, and died for his, the sinner's, redemption.

Science having proved man evoluted from a savage condition; that there was no fall; no general deluge; that virgins do not bear Gods, save in mythological fable; that a hybrid, half God, half man, is a pagan fiction; that belief is a creature of evidence, not of will; and that education has made the old creed a bundle of nonsense, therefore it may be expected the contest at St. Louis will be an animated one, but there can be little hope for a full triumph of the right at present. Doctor the creed as much as they may it will be a bundle of incongruities until the whole system on which the original fabric was based is swept away.

VOICE FROM THE GRAVE

A Most Amazing Case of Telepathy, and Startling Rescue from the Grave.

IT CALLS TO THE RESCUE OF A BURIED WOMAN HER SLEEPING HUSBAND FROM HIS HOME SOME DISTANCE AWAY—THE OPENED GRAVE YIELDS UP ITS OCCUPANT, STILL LIVING—SHE IS ALIVE TO-DAY, BUT MERCIFULLY UNCONSCIOUS OF HER TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE—AN EXTRAORDINARY INSTANCE OF THE RESCUE OF ONE PREMATURELY BURIED, TOLD BY A BISHOP OF THE REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH, IN THE NEW YORK WORLD.

That a woman buried alive called from her grave for help; that by some merciful and mysterious telepathy of love her husband heard her a long distance away; that she was exhumed with frantic haste, tenderly lifted from her coffin, nursed back to health; that she is alive to-day, but unconscious of her marvelous experience—such must be called the most extraordinary case upon record in its combination of telepathy and of an actual rescue from the grave.

It is told by the Right Rev. Samuel Fallows, of Chicago, missionary bishop of the Reformed Episcopal church and professor of mental physiology in Bennett Medical College. This is his account of the case, sent from Chicago to the Sunday World:

The names of the characters in this case must be for the present a secret. To disclose them might be to encompass the death of one; who but for a miracle would not be above ground to-day.

I am now engaged in an effort to so adjust matters, in the interest of science, that the story may be investigated and its truth made as manifest to the most skeptical as it is to me. To achieve this the names of the persons involved must be made known to a limited circle, and some means must be devised to enable the scientists to satisfy themselves as to the voice from the grave and the consequent resurrection without enlightening her who is mercifully unconscious of the ordeal through which she passed.

Her and her husband I will designate Mr. and Mrs. Charles Smith. He was a young business man in an Eastern city. She was a woman of strong emotions and most delicate perceptions. Between them existed a rare sympathy which extended to all the faculties.

Mrs. Smith fell ill, and after a few weeks of agony, during which her husband waited on her with a constancy not often seen, she died. That is, she appeared to die. There was no question about it in the doctor's mind. The customary phenomena of death were present. A certificate was issued and an undertaker was called in.

that Mr. Smith was opposed to embalming there would be no story to tell, unless it were to add another to the list of well-authenticated cases of persons apparently dead reviving for a moment under the lunge of the embalmer's knife.

Saved from that fate, Mrs. Smith was laid out in her burial robes, placed in a coffin and on the third day was buried in a cemetery at some distance from the home.

The husband was greatly affected in spirit—so much so that his relatives feared an attack of melancholia. One of his cousins, wishing to rouse his spirits and divert his attention from the evil that had befallen him, stayed in the house that night—a valuable witness, as it proved, of an event so astounding as almost to beggar belief.

For an hour or two that evening they talked, chiefly about the dead, and then went to bed.

Mr. Smith, after long tossing upon his pillow, fell into a troubled sleep. In the middle of the night he heard a voice calling his name:

"Charles! Charles!"

In an instant Mr. Smith was wide awake, listening. All was still. It was a dream, he thought. Nothing of the supernatural suggested itself to him, for his views were materialistic. He fell asleep again. But again he was awakened by the voice:

"Charles! Charles!"

Strange to say, the tones were not familiar to him. They did not recall the earthly voice of his wife. Still conceiving himself the victim of a dream, he again went to sleep.

It was daybreak before the voice came again, and this time it could not be ignored. He recognized it at last as the voice of his wife in sore distress, calling upon him for aid.

Charles! Save me! Save me, Charles!"

He sprang out of bed, trembling all over. That despairing cry still rang in his ears. So real was it that, although he was wide awake and remembered perfectly the death, the funeral—all that had happened in the preceding four days—he searched the room for her who had thrice called him by name.

Finding that he was alone, he rushed into his cousin's room, crying:

"Get up! Get up! We must hurry to the cemetery! She is alive! She is calling me!"

The cousin, skeptical as he was by nature, was carried away by Smith's impetuous conviction. Both men threw on some clothing, and while one harnessed the horse to a light buggy the other procured spades. Thus equipped they drove at a gallop for the cemetery.

The sun rose as they leaped out at the graveside and began to dig. Mrs. Smith had been buried the previous afternoon. Her husband shovelled away the earth in a frenzy of energy. It was firmly fixed in his mind now that she had been buried alive and that he might yet be in time to save her. His cousin, yielding to the infection of excitement, wielded the other spade with a vigor hardly inferior to his own.

Sweating, soiled and dishevelled, they at length reached the coffin. Together they wrenched off the lid.

Smith uttered a loud cry. His wife was moving; she was trying feebly to turn over in her narrow bed. She looked into his face with eyes that saw not, for she was unconscious of her situation.

He passed his arms about her and lifted her out. Together the two men removed her from the grave, placed her in the buggy and drove her home. Physicians were called in. Under close medical care she slowly recovered from her malady. Every precaution was taken to guard her from a knowledge of what had happened and all persons who were in the secret pledged themselves to silence.

To this day it would be a dangerous experiment to reveal to Mrs. Smith the circumstances of her burial and resurrection. The shock might be fatal to her. It is for this reason that I have used fictitious names.

And now I am asked to explain the voice which awakened Mr. Smith to his wife's peril. There seems to be only one explanation. That is that the buried woman's sub-conscious mind influenced her husband's mind telepathically and warned him of her danger.

There is nothing unreasonable about that explanation. It is as certain as any newly ascertained thing can be that there is such a phenomenon as we designate by the word "telepathy." My researches have convinced me of it and that the limitations at present imposed on the intercommunication of physically remote minds need only to be scientifically understood to be, in large part, in the way of removal. The time has passed when wise men will stand with bated breath before the phenomena of a psychic experience such as that involved in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Smith.

MATERIALIZATION.

Proofs as Established by the World of Science.

The recent scientific tests made by Professor Sir William Crookes touching the genuineness of materializations, ought to establish the fact that we are not hypnotized when we witness this particular phase of phenomena. The Professor was seemingly very thorough in his investigations—had five cameras trained upon the cabinet, of different sizes, which were not hypnotized, and has secured some 44 negatives of Katie King, Miss Cooks' spirit control, some of which are excellent, others inferior, while a few were spoilt developing. The investigation extended to taking the pulse of the materialized Katie King, which was beating regularly at 75, while that of her medium was timed as upon former tests, at 90. The beating of Katie's heart was about normal and quite regular. A lock of Katie's hair was cut off after having traced it up to the scalp to determine that it actually grew there, and by comparing it with that of the medium's it was found to be quite different and of a golden auburn color.

This was no ordinary investigation, made by so scientific a man as Sir Wm. Crookes, who is so extensively known the world over as one whose sole purpose in making these tests was to arrive at the actual facts and let the world know the truth. Those who pose as being very orthodox in their views, claim we are hypnotized when we behold these marvelous materializations in these latter days; but it does not even occur to these good people that Peter, James and John might have been afflicted with the same malady when they beheld the same phenomena back in the apostolic age, upon the mount, when they thought they saw, and perhaps they did see, Moses and Elias in shining garments.

Marvelous seances are being held in these days, that seem to eclipse those of former periods, which have been heralded from the housetops with such emphasis, showing conclusively that the laws governing these wonderful manifestations of to-day are identical with those of past ages. Jesus is said to have appeared twice in the upper chamber after his crucifixion, the last time was eight days after his first materialization, and in each instance "the doors were shut" which would debar a physical body from entering. Clearly this would lead us to the conclusion that this was a materialization and not the crucified body, but an exact counterpart, with flesh and bones, and blood pulsating in all the veins. This may be that "spiritual body" which is quite as easily recognized as the natural body—and recognition in the spirit world humanity craves.

We are living in the grandest period of investigation in the world's history, we are thinking and acting more independently, and there is an earnest seeking after facts instead of fables. The mists are being dissipated from the mythical past, which cannot stand the searchlight that bear down upon it. There is a hungering and thirsting after truth, and an intense desire is pervading the minds of thinking people to personally investigate all matters, and not swallow all the dogmas that filter through the religionists of former days. We are trying to sift the wheat from the chaff, and it is to be hoped that all will have the assistance of the angelic hosts in clearing up the mysteries of life in the body and out of it. As we endeavor to know the truth, our friends across the way will intensify the light unto a noon-day radiance, and humanity will be lifted above beliefs into actual knowledge. The two worlds are already near each other, within hailing distance along the line of receptiveness. We are beginning to know something of our capabilities and possibilities and if we but develop the powers that our Creator has given us, we shall be the proud possessors of the truth which shall make us free. ANNEX.

Perversion of Government.

Missionaries in foreign lands, says the Truth Seeker, cost the United States government a million dollars a year, nearly all of which is spent in investigating baseless claims for indemnity made by the missionaries against the countries in which they are introducing the gospel. A man-of-war is kept in Chinese waters the year round for no other purpose than to give the sacred missionaries the necessary courage to stay there. These missionaries go out, we are told, with their lives in their hands and their trust in the Lord, and yet they have more faith in the protection of the old wooden war-ship Monocacy, with a few Jack Tars aboard of her, than they have in the sparrow-watching deity in whose interests they profess to be working.

When the Devil shaved the pig, there was great cry and little wool. This describes the missionary business with considerable accuracy.

They Find What They Want.

"German scholars have found among Egyptian papyri what they believe to be the lost gospel to the Egyptians, written by St. Peter."—Ex.

Anything in the form of books to correct, or interpret gospels are now found at will. Professional literary forgers finding documents that strengthen the claims of the church in greatest demand, have turned their attention and learning in that direction, hence the multitude of papyrus rolls lately thrown on the market. After soiling and giving such productions the appearance of great antiquity, they are secreted among rubbish to be overhauled in the presence of witnesses after the manner of Joe. Smith, with his plates claimed as the Book of Mormon, then they are unearthed to the glory of the church, and the great profit of the forger, who wrote at the instance of some prelate who had dictated the points he wanted made prominent.

VOL. 3, OF THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF DEATH.

To the Editor:—I wish to express my appreciation of Vol. 3, Encyclopedia of Death. While Vol's. 1 and 2 are excellent, in my judgment Vol. 3 surpasses them in interest, and as leading premium of The Progressive Thinker for the current year should assist in largely augmenting your subscription list. The book will be prized by every Spiritualist and should be read by every person who has any fear of the natural and beautiful change called death.

Chicago, Ill. WILL C. HODGE.

No Footsteps Backward.

It seems to us that our facetiously sarcastic friend whose "Timely Warning" we publish on the first page, may not be so unilluminated as he pretends, as to "just what 'Our Cause' is," and he may be quite clear and definite when he undertakes to "imagine what Modern Spiritualism stands for." Our Cause is simply Spiritualism, and the spread of its knowledge.

We have no doubt that during his years of experience as a Spiritualist, he has had a reasonably definite and clear idea of Spiritualism, what it is, and that idea has been something very different and quite distinct from, nor would it be made more clear and definite by, a belief in infinite intelligence, or a belief in anything else. Belief is not knowledge, and the knowledge implied in Spiritualism does not come by a study of any statement of beliefs.

The continuity of the spirit entity, man, as a finite intelligence, demonstrated in many ways by practical proofs of identity, return and communication, constitute the basis and essence of Modern Spiritualism, and it does not need a creed of any sort or name, to make it clearer to the world; nor declaration that we, Spiritualists "believe in infinite intelligence."

Some Spiritualists "believe in infinite intelligence," and some do not—and the latter are just as good Spiritualists, real Spiritualists, as the former. And yet, by such a declaration of the "principles of Spiritualism," these non-believers are placed before the world, falsely and wrongly, as believing in that which they do not believe. They have just right and good cause to protest against being placed in an utterly false position—and they are true Spiritualists and entitled to the name, as perfectly as are those who "believe in infinite intelligence," or "God," or any other person, being or thing of which or whom they know nothing and can only say they "believe."

It is quite safe to say that no intelligent person is at all mystified or uncertain concerning the import, or underlying idea of Spiritualism. People have acquired this knowledge, too, without any creed, confession of faith, or long string of we-believes to study in order to learn what Spiritualism is.

Spiritualism does not consist in a categorical statement of beliefs about "God," "infinite intelligence," total depravity, predestination, a substitutionary or bloody atonement; or any other of the many things that are believed and disbelieved by the many men of many minds of earth and the skies. None of these things goes to constitute Spiritualism.

The editorial on "Hints for the Good of the Cause" was especially written to urge certain lines of practical work by Spiritualists for the furtherance of "the cause" of Spiritualism. Spiritualism is its own "cause," within the meaning of the word "cause" as therein used.

It was deemed essential that there should be a well-grounded practical knowledge of the facts represented in Spiritualism; and the means to this end advocated were the home circle, the lyceum and spiritual literature. The home circle is advocated because it affords a knowledge of genuine spirit phenomena, approximately free from temptation to fraud; the lyceum continues the work of instruction into the realm of ethics, untainted by the perversions of mental visions wrought by the doctrinal theology taught in orthodox Sunday schools; and spiritual papers for old and young convey a rich fund of information pertaining to Spiritualism.

There is not one of these that will not do more good for "Our Cause" than any course of study in "statements of what "we believe," as set forth by any body of delegates claiming to act for and in behalf of Spiritualists as a whole.

The home circle, by its demonstrations, and the lyceum by its influence in training the young, must ever be important factors in the growth and stability of local Spiritualist societies, and powerful aids to the "cause" of Spiritualism.

The "Hints for the Good of the Cause" were germane to the subject, and pertinent to the welfare and advancement of the cause of Spiritualism. No means can be advocated that will do more to upbuild and strengthen Spiritualism than will home circles, lyceums, and literature for the old and young. No "statement of principles" can compare with either of these simple factors as an aid to "Our Cause." Either of them, alone, is of more value as a factor for good, than all the creeds ever concocted, from the Nicene creed down to the "statement" of the N. S. A. inclusive.

"The poor little, half-formed, defective creature at birth," which was launched into this mundane stage of existence by the N. S. A., has been no aid to Spiritualism, and no amount of wet-nursing can ever make it other than a puny "attempt."

Progression, among Spiritualists generally, does not consist in going backward to the old Egyptian fleshpots of credalism, by any name whatsoever, for which some of the "leaders" apparently hanker. The motto—the "creed," if you will, of the great mass of Spiritualists is "Nulla Vestigia Retrorsum"—No Footsteps Backward. Aping churches in the matter of a creed, is not progression forward, but backward.

As for the puny "attempt" brought forth by the N. S. A., after such laborious effort, the best excuse for its being is: "It is such a little one."

FOR THE MASSES.

Unto the Poor Let the Gospel Be Preached.

"Something for nothing" is not the animus of "free gospel" contention, but to bring the price of Spiritualism and its teachings within easy reach of the masses. As now conducted, only large and wealthy societies dare send for a medium or speaker. If our principles are good for the few, they are better for the many. If we are to have a universal religion, the people must be educated, develop their own media, and prepare the masses for a higher civilization—a new heaven, not off in the skies, but right here on this beautiful earth, now profaned by man and his iniquities, but to be regenerated for a world of righteousness, and a universal brotherhood—the New Jerusalem that John so vividly saw on the Isle of Patmos, not this civilization with its saloons and brothels, its withering curse of usury, its damning lust for money, its evictions and starvations, its bloody wars and vivisection hells, the sickening details of men's cruelties from the cradle to the grave, and then ask if Spiritualism has no higher teachings to humanity than the tinkle of shekels, and the glittering generalities of silks and satins!

I have wondered if Spiritualists and mediums understand the message they are bringing from the skies, and if its value can be computed in anything but the eternal verities—if it belongs to a select few, or all God's children. Heaven knows we need men and women imbued with the old Methodist spirit of itinerary, that, taking neither food nor scrip, worked in the wilderness of total depravity with a zeal and earnestness that knew no failure; and I never hear the wail that comes up from some of our gifted mediums of "nothing to do," that I do not feel like calling out, "Come among us, and ye shall find food and shelter, and audiences to hear the glad tidings that fall from your inspired lips, or witness, with joy and gladness, the phenomenal proofs of a demonstrated immortality through your unfolded powers."

In rural districts, Spiritualists are regarded as mild-eyed lunatics, or unbalanced fanatics; but throw light upon this delusion by successive meetings, popularize the movement by constant repetitions and lo! "A Worker" will see many Spiritualists come out of their shells, and straighten up with "a backbone"—poor souls! they ought to be proud of the truth, and testify every day in the year to its glorious beneficence, instead of hovering under the dark pall of old orthodoxy.

When I learned that the Devil was a fake, hell a myth, and the whole scheme a sugar-coated lie, I wanted to shout the glad tidings the world around, and I feel yet as though the movement should penetrate every school district, and know of no better way than a ten-cent fee at the door that works no hardship to any one, and sends the speaker or medium on rejoicing. If Spiritualists have triumphantly withstood the scorn, odium, ridicule, and persecution of fifty years, they need not wince at the little slur of a "ten-cent show." The church resorts to dinners and suppers, to fairs and bazaars, for money to spread its propaganda. Why may not we?

We stand at the opening door of a co-operative commonwealth, and no people ought to be more competent to take the initiative in collective ownership of lands, camps and fixtures than Spiritualists. I do not share the misgivings of some writers, for if men can run a one-sided government, though often wobbly and unsatisfactory, men and women of intelligence and unselfishness ought to be able to conduct meetings and camps along equitable and inexpensive lines. The Question Answered by Another.

Ex-President Harrison, a rigid Presbyterian, before the General Missionary Conference, late in session in New York, is reported to have said:

"Blot out of our constitution and law all that has been received from this sacred book (the Bible) and what would be left to bind society together?"

What was there to bind society together before there was any Bible? All the virtues blossomed long ages before a Bible was known. Pythagoras taught his Golden Precepts 500 years before the alleged birth of Jesus, and left his life a glorious example for the best of mankind to imitate. And Seneca's Morals, the work of a Pagan philosopher, born before Jesus, whose voluminous writings and worthy morals are the admiration of scholars, are thought by many to have supplied the Gospel makers with the best things they credited to Jesus. The claim that our civilization and our laws are based on the Bible is too shallow to be accepted by any one familiar with ancient history.

THE UNCHANGEABLE.

They tell us that nothing is sure in this world,
That beauty soon flickers away;
To-morrow the beauty may crumble to dust,
To-morrow the monarch may beg for a crust—
Man's power is but for a day.

To-morrow the courses of rivers may change,
And mountains may sink out of sight;
To-morrow the friend who to-day has your aid
May steal up behind you with glittering blade—
The world is made over each night.

They tell us that nothing is sure in this world,
That all is but change or decay;
Yet one thing will change not as long as winds blow:
Some men will be high and some men will be low
Till the blast on the Judgment Day!

"The Size of Man" as Illustrated by Charles Dawbarn.

THE BRILLIANT CALIFORNIA PHILOSOPHER, CHARLES DAWBARN, SENDS FORTH FROM HIS SAN LEANDRO HOME A TIDAL WAVE OF THOUGHT THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO OUR READERS.

Newton's discovery of the outworking of gravitation left a great unknown quantity in his demonstrated fact of the attraction existing between distant bodies. No one could imagine how the sun was holding his planets by a force active in what was supposed to be a vast vacuum, called "space." But the fact was there, so the questions continued until at last a satisfactory answer has been obtained. Space may, and does appear to be empty, but is now discovered to be full of a wondrous substance called "ether." And herein is, at last, an opportunity for a man to learn something of himself and his own powers, since he himself, like everything else, lives and has his being amidst this wondrous, all-penetrating ether, and is subject to its laws. In most respects ether is the very opposite of matter. It is so rigid that it holds the planets to their play around the sun, which requires more force than if there was a steel rod attached to every square inch of the earth's surface. So ether is more rigid than steel, and yet it produces absolutely no friction. It has not affected our earth's motion by one second in ten thousand years. Since heat is arrested motion we discover that this wonderful ether cannot itself be heated. The temperature of space is thus simply zero. Ether has waves, longitudinal and transverse, by which energy travels before it is transmuted into light, heat, etc., in the friction of our atmosphere. And it is to-day a generally accepted truth that matter itself is composed of "little whirls" as modes of motion of the ether itself and of course subject to its laws.

These interesting facts are now accessible to every student, and are already taught in our schools and colleges. I have thus alluded to them because I find therein a key to certain of the mysterious limitations that encompass a mortal in his earth life. It is from that standpoint I am proposing to study them. I want to find out, if I can, more about both the limitations and the powers of manhood in earth life.

Man has been accepting things for just what they appear to be, and we know, from sad experience, that Nature leaves him to work in the dark until he invents his own tallow candle. We have further discovered that man is subject to the laws of both ether and matter. He is really a compound of both. Certain of his senses are expressions in matter, while others work only through ether. Philosophy has not yet grasped the import of this, or its effect upon manhood, so the student reader and I will try and blaze a path for ourselves through this forest of the unknown.

The limitations of man the mortal appear hopeless to the worshiper of matter. Indeed, in his "Mathematics of the Probable," he first takes the real manhood out of man, and then reduces him to an equation. He calls this the Law of Averages. He will take a large city and tell you how many will die next year, and how many will be sick and get well. He knows how many children will be born and how many will die. He will also tell you the names of the diseases that will kill them. He will not only tell you how many will get married, but knows how many will commit suicide, and will describe the methods by which they will individually leap out into the unknown. In a myriad other details he will show you man in the swaddling clothes of his own surroundings. And this scientific calculator is usually marvelously correct. Give him statistics long enough and broad enough and he will absolutely prove that man the mortal is really the slave of destiny. Both the man and his calculator are gauging their lives by the limitations of matter. Some day these limitations will not work, and that will be when man knows more of his own powers which work and manifest in the ether.

Now let us look a little deeper into manhood and its place in nature. We have three factors to take into consideration. (1) Man. (2) Matter. (3) Ether.

Man's contact with his surroundings and expressions of his own intelligence is by means of sensory and motor nerves. To realize what this means we must here, for a few moments, fall back upon the laws of vibration, as taught in our schools and colleges. Let a pendulum swing with measured beat and the student will discover that eighty such movements in a second will produce a sound which he calls "tone," and is the very deepest base his sense of hearing can grasp. As the pendulum swings more rapidly the "tone" will ascend the scale till at last it vanishes into silence. His mortal limit has been reached in that direction when some fifty or sixty thousand vibrations in one second has been recorded, and the shrill echo has ceased. It has marked the end of his possible power of hearing with mortal ear. Now comes a tremendous gap wherein the scientist finds no foothold even for his imagination. Fancy that pendulum increasing its speed, faster and yet faster, till it has reached four hundreds of millions of millions of vibrations in one second, and mortal man once again senses its movement, but this time not as sound but as color. He calls his first vision red. Then following the chromatic scale a few more hundreds of hundreds of millions of vibrations he first senses violet, and then becomes blind. He has discovered that on one side of his sight limit heat rays sparkle and burn, and he guesses to-day that beyond the other boundary is the home of the X-Ray which laughs at the so-called invisible. But what of that huge gap which has never been claimed by God or man? Intelligence has accepted and acknowledged sense limitation as the foundation of personality. Personality is of course itself a limitation of manhood, and the finite will always be limited. But herein is the trouble. It is all right and natural that manhood should have powers that commence at one end and finish off at the other. But why there should be a huge gap in the middle is the mystery, or rather the problem, waiting a reasonable explanation.

Give a musician a piano with just a couple of notes at one end and a part of an octave at the other as all he can use, and you will have but poor attempts at melody, and a great deal of disharmony as the result. Now suppose a visitor from some other and more favored planet were to see such an instrument and learn that it expressed man's limitation, he would at once infer that there were notes and octaves somewhere that could and might fill up the gap, and let the soul of the musician sing its higher melodies. The visitor would say to the mortal: "You have been accepting this gap as made by natural law, whereas your effort should be to reach out from either end of your instrument, adding note to note, and at every discovery increasing the musician's power of expression." Among those he addressed there would be two classes of minds alike interested. One would say "the gap in our instrument is God's design. Let it alone. Religion forbids your intermeddling." The other class would simply keep toiling on, and finding a new note now and then till, perhaps, a whole octave might have been gained in the name and by the efforts of science. But even then the awful gap remains as a disheartening fact practically unchanged. The idea of a piano is itself a limitation. Let the reader think of an instrument a mile long, with mortal man sounding a few notes at each end, and a great silence between; he will then realize more clearly this great gap and what it means to himself and others. Man is an Ego, ever seeking to express himself by every means at his disposal, and, speaking for myself and the reader, Ego rebels at a limitation which may, after all, be one of ignorance only. Man is continuing to accept things for just what they appear to be, at least until he finds out to the contrary. Thus to-day he calls himself lord of creation, although he can only use a few notes at each end of his sense instrument, and has an awful gap of emptiness between one end and the other. This is the position which I want to discuss and examine, with a divine discontent at my own limitation.

Space has long been counted as filled with nothingness. Five or six miles climb from ocean's level left man gasping for breath, and a mile or two further was the limit even to bird life. Man has now discovered that space is full—absolutely full—without even a tiny crack, of a substance which is the reality of the All in All, and of which matter is but the passing shadow. Man in his ignorance has talked of empty space between sun, planet and distant star. It was for him just one of the huge gaps, like the one we note in sense limitation, only very much larger. Man the student and explorer now knows there is no gap at all, but just a solid roadway, over which the trained mind may travel back and forth. With his telescopic and spectroscopic motor wagon man wends his way to and fro, stopping if he pleases at comet and asteroid way stations. Or, if he prefer, he travels inward to further and further homes of intelligence and activity. With such experiences the scientist now tells us the great gap in space was imagination and born of ignorance. But all the same that scientist does not yet dare to deny the gap in his own sense limit which leaves him a few thousands of vibrations on one shore, with millions of millions on the other, and all between just nothing at all. At this point the careful student may find a thought of comfort. He now knows, as a fact, that the space between planet and star is filled with ether waves, vibratory with energy. But man himself is immersed in ether as much as is sun, planet or star. So there can be no more vacuum for him than for space. His senses are merely manifestations of his own divine energy. At one end the coarse atmosphere vibrates for him into sound. At the other he discovers it is ether waves vibrating with beauty and love. But there is—there can be—no gap between, since ether is the universal All in All, and man himself lives in it, moves in it and thinks in it. The gap has been the imagination of ignorance—the auto-suggestion which has held him in the same quicksand which buried his grandfather. But all the same the fact remains to-day that man does not seem to have gained many octaves out of the millions that lay between his hearing and his sight. This both demands and justifies a careful examination of manhood itself in the light of the recent discovery that Nature has no such thing as a vacuum, or even a crevice, in her whole system.

We commence with the question "What is man?" That is an old, a very old question, and has been answered in two ways. One is that he is the direct creation of a Supreme Divinity. The other, that he is the evoluted result of aggregations of atoms, and that his brain secretes thought as his liver secretes bile. Neither answer is satisfactory, for both alike leave unfilled this awful gap between his sense limitations. Taking nature as a whole we find intelligence everywhere, but we only perceive it atmosphere may be charged with the form of energy we atmosphere may be charged with the force of energy we call "electricity," but it is only when it is personified into a brief flash that we recognize it and call it "lightning." Every manifestation of intelligence is a flash from the mighty whole. And in the light of an eternity, without either time or space, it matters not whether personified intelligence count years by centuries or millions, it is still only a flash, moving in ether-filled space, and subject to its laws.

Such to me is manhood. I count it as a flash of the universal and divine intelligence, born amidst the eternal energy, which has rippled the ether into waves. Another effect of the eternal energy is to compel vortex rings or minute whirls of ether, known to us all as the atom of physical science. So the flash of intelligence, compelled by an energy we call First Cause, because we cannot comprehent it, is playing amidst the ether as lightning plays amid the atmosphere of our planet. But where the ether is whirled into atoms intelligence finds a quick limit. A little sound, smell, taste and touch are the possible manifestations of intelligence amid such cramped conditions. But thought and will power are children of the ether, and compel tiny waves that travel on and on through frictionless space. They linger for a brief hour amidst the atoms, manifesting as sight, normal or astral, but soon pass on and out, becoming the spiritual glow which ennobles manhood.

Such is my answer to the question "What is man?" But this answer also involves an explanation of the great gap that separates man's lower and higher self in the life of to-day. Physical sight is necessarily as material as hearing, although born of waves of ether instead of matter. It is through physical organs that man the mortal uses each of his five senses. And whatever other faculties man may possess they must, in earth life, find physical expression or remain silent. So we have as an acknowledged fact a human personality, expressing itself through vibration of material atoms, as the mouthpiece of an Ego who has apparently no other inlet into earth life. We have the further fact that this personality uses, or seems to use, just a few vibrations at each end of a key-board, with no reason, that we can discern, for this extraordinary limitation. The personality is man, with a most limited manhood, but there is no reason, we can discover, why Ego should have this marvelous limitation. As a matter of common sense, Ego, being himself personified intelligence, can have no other limitation than the laws of ether and matter compel. There can be no gap in his forceful grasp between one note in the scale of vibrations and another. He must play upon one as easily as upon the others. The only reason of the apparent gap is the limitation of our earth-bound sense, which stops short suddenly, as if it were cut off for the very purpose of making man the mortal a ridiculous parody of what he should be if Ego were in full control.

There are plenty of proofs of the presence of Ego within this gap, where man and Nature have seemed to be silent. All the phenomena of psychometry, the whole field of psychic manifestation, which includes clairvoyance, all that we call intuition, and that which is called "subconsciousness," are founded upon vibrations that are outside our normal limit. And the reason they are so imperfectly manifested, so full of errors and perplexities, is because mortal man translates, or tries to translate them into the vibratory expressions of his everyday life. So let us ever remember that Ego is a flash from the infinite, and cannot be limited to just a few octaves of expression on the mighty keyboard of the universe.

It should now be evident that Ego can strike one chord as well as another, although mortal mind may be silent to one, and count the other as his limit. This gives me quite a different idea of my own personality. I now remember, with glorified humility, that I am an Ego, expressing myself in earth life with so few notes that there is necessarily more of inharmony than melody. All that I have counted woe, misery, and fated cruelty in earth life is based upon my inability to sense the other notes by which my Ego is expressing himself to his brother intelligences. Let us ever remember that every imperfect chord proclaims a perfect chord somewhere awaiting the student's search. Cruelty and hate are only imperfect chords which in fullness would express brotherly love. All the same we have to-day these limitations in our earth life. Things are not what they seem to be in our manhood any more than in the expressions of nature around us. And our Ego is, and has been thus misjudged only because we do not see and grasp enough of him to realize that what is called "devil" is only a very imperfect manifestation of godhood.

It is a great advance when we have grasped even a thought of the powers that necessarily belong to every Ego, but that is only the threshold of our theme. I call my theme "The Fullness of Man," because I recognize man the mortal as but a very limited expression of the man Ego, who is himself a flash of the divine. I believe that man in his fullness can play every note in the vast scale. The melody may be outside our limited grasp of to-day but I count it as a present reality to be taken into account in our everyday study of "spirit return" and its problems. It is for me the one great factor in telepathic contact between mortal and spirit, as well as between mortal and mortal. And as this is an existing and ever present reality of to-day, I confess myself but little interested in what seem to me fanciful conceptions of future reincarnation. My interest is centered on the possible incarnations which are, or may be expressing my personality to-day.

Now let us as students mark the point we have reached. We have accepted as a most natural assumption that man the Ego can have no such gap in his powers as is apparently the case in earth life. We have noted that for the mortal his hearing is the effect of but a few thousands of vibrations, while his sight demands millions of millions, with no apparent connecting foothold for human intelligence. Man the mortal is thus touching matter with one sense, and ether with another. And yet further let us remember that man, whether mortal or spirit, will ever be a personified intelligence which we call Ego.

It is obvious that if matter be, as is claimed, but one expression of ether then Ego has a broad field for his experiences, which experiences can only be connected in the Ego himself, and not in any of his personalities. For instance, if an Ego be to-day, as I claim, playing upon his instrument and using every note and octave, we, his neighbors or brethren, could sense no more of him than is permitted by the limitations of the matter in which we are now living. Where we enter the silence the Ego is in full activity. He who could once reach a position where he might witness this manifestation of Ego would perceive him at work by will power, thus both causing and using the vibratory waves of the ether to express his intelligence. I mean that this expression by Ego of his greater fulness is necessarily going on Now. Where the silence begins for the mortal, Ego is expressing a new personality, but only because we are not yet broad enough to see and sense that the two personalities are but manifestations of the one Ego, in operation at the same time.

It is here that Psychical Research has blundered its way along through a few vibrations, and out into the dark and silent sense limit of the poor mortal. It thus becomes necessary to examine a little into the experiences called "spirit return." When the Universal Intelligence has flashed out into the frictionless ether it becomes, necessarily, a personality of vast, but still finite, breadth and limitation. And since the ether is frictionless this personality is necessarily unlimited by time. The Ego must thus stand as a huge personality to any intelligence capable of sensing the entire outburst and its effect. But to the onlooker less advanced there will appear only so much or so many a personality as his limited vision can grasp at one time. So we poor mortals are just wee, puny, human personalities to ourselves, because that is all we can perceive to-day of our grand divine whole. Nevertheless the reader and I are Egos with experiences going on at this very moment that are outside our mortal sense limit. The day is soon coming for each of us when our point of view will become less limited. We call that "death." Then we necessarily become conscious of a broader manhood working in more or less of the great vibratory gap which we have noted as impossible to the mortal.

We can further discern that Ego is practically unaffected by death. He was manifesting amid vibrations before, and he is manifesting amid vibrations still; so to himself the only change is that the one personality we call mortal has ceased to be an expression of his intelligence. We call this personality which is thus active after death "spirit," and can now perceive that it finds itself in a position that has not yet been noted either by the Society for Psychical Research or by the mere worshiper of spirit return. In the first place his present experiences are not new to him. He has been living them all the time he was a mortal, although the personality was not the same. Of course when the mortal dies the intelligence cannot at once make the connection between the two personalities, although the Ego himself has needed both for a complete expression of his manhood. Necessarily the existing spirit personality can only have any record or impressions of earth experiences through the Ego. But the Ego can himself only record them in the vibrations amid which they were gathered.

In the mortal life we have a mental personality whose experiences must have been largely a dream to the personality beyond. The two personalities have undoubtedly mingled and blended in dreams and psychic experiences, and when one ceases the other goes on much as before. The mortal at last becomes immortal. His experiences are now, as it were, merged into the personality that has been playing all the time inside the awful vibratory gap. For a time, perhaps, he struggles to maintain his individuality and go on using the old vibrations. What a mess he makes of it is recorded in the history of spirit return. If he can find a suitable instrument he struggles to record and repeat his mortal experiences, and usually fails to establish his own identity, at least to the satisfaction of a careful student. Yet his struggle tells the tale that manhood is not what it appears to be to mortals in earth life, but is only a limited expression of a vast reality. As a returning spirit he can bring almost nothing of thought or experiences from life within the gap, because they necessarily belong to those vibrations where the mortal has no foothold. Our visitor must talk from the mortal standpoint into mortal ear, and amidst such limitations the personality, who while a mortal had exhibited a grand intelligence among his fellows, now comes back, halting and confused with his effort to even make himself known.

Yet again, there had been and still is a psychic connection between the two personalities. We already recognize the subconscious self as a reality, but we find it just what it must be under these conditions. It comes as a mentality in most respects inferior to that of the mortal because, at its best, it is not playing amid its own normal sense vibrations. So it can express but a shadow of its real powers, but all the same it is another personality of the same Ego.

Let me here ask the reader to picture a performer on a grand organ, with a theme and execution worthy of the greatest artist known to earth life. Let the instrument be so constructed that only a few notes at either end of the scale are audible to the student who is listening. Occasionally there will be harmony, but, for the most part, discords and even absurd rhythms will greet the ear. That listener represents mortal life. Yonder sit other listeners whose normal hearing is adapted to the very notes to which our mortal student has been deaf. They listen with rapture because vastly more of the theme is aglint with soul melody for them. Yet, here and there, to them also there is sad imperfection for lack of the very tones our mortal student is grasping. These are the experiences of spirit life.

The one who plays, to whom every note is alike an expression of his soul, is realizing a divine ecstasy as he thus experiences somewhat of infinite harmony and love. That player is Ego. Your Ego, reader, and mine.

Such is life, mortal and immortal. And such it becomes in its one-ness, instead of the fragmentary manifestations upon which theology, philosophy and even science has each sought foothold.

I catch a moan from some of my readers who insist that whatever may happen they want to cling to the feelings, emotions and experiences of to-day. It is like a child refusing to become a man lest he forget the details of his childhood. Yet such a moaning cry is quite natural to the present limited personality. But the feeling and the cry are alike absurd to Ego, for, as we have seen, he has never in reality had any such limitation. This mortal personality has only been an appearance, founded on the whirls of ether, called atoms of matter, in which he has posed as a mortal. Ego will have just as many personalities as the substance he uses for expression may compel. But he is himself a mighty whole—finite but divine—always and everywhere expressed as fragmentary personalities, each to be weighed and measured by the student who would estimate "the fullness of manhood."

HOME CIRCLES.

Directions for Forming and Conducting Circles for Development.

The first conditions to be observed relate to the persons who compose the circle. These should be, as far as possible, of opposite temperaments, as positive and negative; of moral characters, pure minds, and not marked by repulsive points of either physical or mental condition. No person suffering from disease, or of debilitated physique, should be present at any circle, unless it is formed expressly for healing purposes. I would recommend the number of the circle never to be less than three, or more than twelve. The best number is eight. No person of a strong positive temperament should be present, as any such magnetic spheres emanating from the circle will overpower that of the spirits who must always be positive in the circle in order to produce phenomena.

Never let the apartment be over-heated, the room should be well ventilated. Avoid strong light, which, by producing motion in the atmosphere, disturbs the manifestations. A subdued light is the most favorable for spiritual magnetism.

I recommend the seance to be opened either with prayer or a song sung in chorus, after which subdued, harmonizing conversation is better than wearisome silence; but let the conversation be directed towards the purpose of the gathering, and never sink into discussion or rise to emphasis. Always have a pencil and paper on the table, avoid entering or quitting the room, irrelevant conversation, or disturbances within or without the circle after the seance has commenced.

Do not admit unpunctual comers, nor suffer the air of the room to be disturbed after the sitting commences. Nothing but necessity, indisposition, or impressions, should warrant the disturbance of the sitting, which should never exceed two hours, unless an extension of time be solicited by the spirits.

Let the seance always extend to one hour, even if no results are obtained; it sometimes requires that time for spirits to form their battery. Let it be also remembered that circles are experimental, hence no one should be discouraged if phenomena are not produced at the first few sittings. Stay with the same circle for six sittings; if no phenomena are then produced you may be sure you are not assimilated to each other; in that case, let the members meet with other persons until you succeed.

A well-developed test medium may sit without injury for any person, but a circle sitting for mutual development should never admit persons addicted to bad habits, strongly positive or dogmatical. A candid inquiring spirit is the only proper frame of mind in which to sit for phenomena, the delicate magnetism of which is made or marred as much of mental as physical conditions.

Impressions are the voices of spirits or the monitions of the spirit within us, and should always be followed out, unless suggestive of wrong act or word. At the opening of the circle, one or more are often impressed to change seats with others. One or more are impressed to withdraw, or a feeling of repulsion makes it painful to remain. Let these impressions be faithfully regarded, and pledge each other that no offense shall be taken by following impressions.

If a strong impression to write, speak, sing, dance, or gesticulate possess any mind present, follow it out faithfully. It has a meaning if you cannot at first realize it. Never feel hurt in your own person, nor ridicule your neighbor for any failures to express or discover the meaning of the spirit impressing you.

Spirit control is often deficient, and at first imperfect. By often yielding to it, your organism becomes more flexible, and the spirit more experienced; and practice in control is necessary for spirits as well as mortals. If dark and evil disposed spirits manifest to you, never drive them away, but always strive to elevate them, and treat them as you would mortals, under similar circumstances. Do not always attribute falsehoods to "lying spirits," or deceiving mediums. Many mistakes occur in the communion of which you cannot always be aware.

Unless charged by spirits to do otherwise do not continue to hold sittings with the same parties for more than a twelvemonth. After that time, if not before, fresh elements of magnetism are essential. Some of the original circle should withdraw, and others take their places.

Never seek the spirit circle in a trivial or deceptive spirit. Then, and then only, have you cause to fear it.

Never permit any one to sit in circles who suffer from it in health or mind. Magnetism in the case of such persons is a drug, which operates perniciously, and should be carefully avoided.

Every seventh person can be a medium of some kind, and become fully developed through the judicious operations of the spirit circle. When once mediums are fully developed, the circle sometimes becomes injurious to them. When they feel this to be the case, let none be offended if they withdraw, and only use their gifts in other times and places.

All persons are subject to spirit influence and guidance, but only one in seven can so externalize this power as to become what is called a medium; and let it ever be remembered that trance speakers, no less than mediums for any other gift, can never be influenced by spirits far beyond their own normal capacity in the matter of the intelligence rendered, the magnetism of the spirits being but a quickening fire, which inspires the brain, and, like a hot-house process on plants, forces into prominence latent powers of the mind, but creates nothing. Even in the case of merely automatic speakers, writers, rapping, and other forms of test mediumship, the intelligence of the spirit is measurably shaped by the capacity and idiosyncrasies of the medium. All spirit power is limited in expression by the organism through which it works, and spirits may control, inspire, and influence the human mind, but do not change or re-create it.

IDIOSYNCRASIES.

In Relation to Moral Conduct

In The Progressive Thinker of April 14, Prof. B. F. Underwood has an article on "Morality by Legislation." He says, "Legislation is not the scientific, effective method. The true way to improve conditions is to teach and enforce morals in the nursery, the home, the higher grades of instruction, and the private life of the individual."

And further says: "The moral progress is a process of inward growth which results from experience and knowledge."

He is eminently right in saying morality is a product of experience and knowledge. He could have gone further and said there are as many different moralities as there are individual experiences. One parent sends his boy to school with the command not to fight with the other boys. This is the morality of this parent. The next parent has a different morality, and tells his boy if the other boys fight him and he doesn't fight back and lick 'em, he will lick him when he comes home.

In some homes it is better moralify to stroll the green fields Sundays than to step on the threshold of any church. In other homes the reverse morality prevails.

Some distinguished minds declare that tobacco is worth more to the world, morally, than potatoes.

Vivisection is moral in some schools, and immoral in others.

Suicide, under certain circumstances, with some, is moral; with many others it possesses no moral side.

In some homes it is taught there is no moral ground for divorce. Other homes teach there are more than a dozen moral grounds for it.

Vaccination is moral here, and immoral there.

In one of the thirteen original states of the Union, Sunday kissing was immoral. Now the morality of all the states permits unlimited Sunday kissing.

Polygamy is moral in Utah, and immoral in Congress.

To tell white lies is moral in many nurseries and homes. In many others it is immoral.

In France it is good morality to bring children up on wine. In Germany the moral sentiment raises children on beer. In the United States children come up under all manner of moral theories.

For nineteen centuries the church, in stentorian tones, has preached and coaxed and threatened for greater morality. In all these centuries the church has been unsuccessful in its endeavor to establish a general moral standard.

Where Prof. Underwood would enforce morals in the nursery, the home, and the school, as the profoundest method of progress, it sounds to me like the old musty church talk. I may be wrong. I think the morals of all of us change as the view-point changes. If this is true, then the Brother's formula becomes a simple platitude.

Within the last thirty years I have heard the highest Christian sentiment in the land repeatedly declare the teachings of Prof. Underwood immoral. I don't believe it. But suppose it true. Then surely he is not the man to set the moral pace for the nursery, the home, and the school.

However able Brother Underwood might be to frame a code of morals applicable to everybody; and should he call together a World's Parliament of Moralities to pronounce on it, I doubt if it would agree that he is in harmony with the sciences. "When doctors disagree, who shall decide?" The scientists decide not to wait longer for the church to study out the question of what is abstract morality, for the reason that the church never studies. It begins and ends with "Thus saith the Lord."

Now a word about the Professor's conscience telling him that legislation is a thing of doubtful value. He says, "where the moral sentiment is deep, law is unnecessary." When I read of the million dollars the Vanderbilt heirs, of Cornelius, had paid to the state, under the inheritance tax law, I wonder how many million years it would take to educate into the souls of those heirs a sufficiently deep moral sentiment to have made them paid that, in the absence of law. When I read that the New Zealand Republic is so much in advance of ours that you can live easier there on a hundred dollars than on a thousand here, I wonder if deep moral sentiment, and no legislation, did it all?

Brother Underwood speaks especially of Temperance prohibition legislation. I read that when man made his advent on this little speck of earth, he had neither a liquor appetite, nor law, and yet he fell. Jesus understood man's frailty better. He pleaded and prayed with God not to lead his pleasure-loving children into temptation. I read of children born with an aversion to drink, that are gradually lead by associates into drinking; and, lastly, they fill drunkards' graves. The Brother, however, may be right.

On another point, just a single word. It is the question of education. Brother Underwood says, "Pain is the artist's chisel which has shaped and beautified humanity." Other expressions in connection with this show that he believes the greater the pain the better the education. In support of this view he quotes Tennyson:

"That man may rise on stepping stones
Of their dead selves to higher things."

We know that pain has been a powerful chisel in the hand of the schoolmaster of the past; and it suggests that both Brother Underwood and Mr. Tennyson were educated in that school, and that both refuse to believe there is something better. It suggests that neither of them are versed in the new school theory, which is to make study pleasing and attractive, instead of painful.

"The Size of Man" as Illustrated by Charles Dawbarn.

THE BRILLIANT CALIFORNIA PHILOSOPHER, CHARLES DAWBARN, SENDS FORTH FROM HIS SAN LEANDRO HOME A TIDAL WAVE OF THOUGHT THAT WILL PROVE INTERESTING TO OUR READERS.

Newton's discovery of the outworking of gravitation left a great unknown quantity in his demonstrated fact of the attraction existing between distant bodies. No one could imagine how the sun was holding his planets by a force active in what was supposed to be a vast vacuum, called "space." But the fact was there, so the questions continued until at last a satisfactory answer has been obtained. Space may, and does appear to be empty, but is now discovered to be full of a wondrous substance called "ether." And herein is, at last, an opportunity for a man to learn something of himself and his own powers, since he himself, like everything else, lives and has his being amidst this wondrous, all-penetrating ether, and is subject to its laws. In most respects ether is the very opposite of matter. It is so rigid that it holds the planets to their play around the sun, which requires more force than if there was a steel rod attached to every square inch of the earth's surface. So ether is more rigid than steel, and yet it produces absolutely no friction. It has not affected our earth's motion by one second in ten thousand years. Since heat is arrested motion we discover that this wonderful ether cannot itself be heated. The temperature of space is thus simply zero. Ether has waves, longitudinal and transverse, by which energy travels before it is transmuted into light, heat, etc., in the friction of our atmosphere. And it is to-day a generally accepted truth that matter itself is composed of "little whirls" as modes of motion of the ether itself and of course subject to its laws.

These interesting facts are now accessible to every student, and are already taught in our schools and colleges. I have thus alluded to them because I find therein a key to certain of the mysterious limitations that encompass a mortal in his earth life. It is from that standpoint I am proposing to study them. I want to find out, if I can, more about both the limitations and the powers of manhood in earth life.

Man has been accepting things for just what they appear to be, and we know, from sad experience, that Nature leaves him to work in the dark until he invents his own tallow candle. We have further discovered that man is subject to the laws of both ether and matter. He is really a compound of both. Certain of his senses are expressions in matter, while others work only through ether. Philosophy has not yet grasped the import of this, or its effect upon manhood, so the student reader and I will try and blaze a path for ourselves through this forest of the unknown.

The limitations of man the mortal appear hopeless to the worshiper of matter. Indeed, in his "Mathematics of the Probable," he first takes the real manhood out of man, and then reduces him to an equation. He calls this the Law of Averages. He will take a large city and tell you how many will die next year, and how many will be sick and get well. He knows how many children will be born and how many will die. He will also tell you the names of the diseases that will kill them. He will not only tell you how many will get married, but knows how many will commit suicide, and will describe the methods by which they will individually leap out into the unknown. In a myriad other details he will show you man in the swaddling clothes of his own surroundings. And this scientific calculator is usually marvelously correct. Give him statistics long enough and broad enough and he will absolutely prove that man the mortal is really the slave of destiny. Both the man and his calculator are gauging their lives by the limitations of matter. Some day these limitations will not work, and that will be when man knows more of his own powers which work and manifest in the ether.

Now let us look a little deeper into manhood and its place in nature. We have three factors to take into consideration. (1) Man. (2) Matter. (3) Ether.

Man's contact with his surroundings and expressions of his own intelligence is by means of sensory and motor nerves. To realize what this means we must here, for a few moments, fall back upon the laws of vibration, as taught in our schools and colleges. Let a pendulum swing with measured beat and the student will discover that eighty such movements in a second will produce a sound which he calls "tone," and is the very deepest base his sense of hearing can grasp. As the pendulum swings more rapidly the "tone" will ascend the scale till at last it vanishes into silence. His mortal limit has been reached in that direction when some fifty or sixty thousand vibrations in one second has been recorded, and the shrill echo has ceased. It has marked the end of his possible power of hearing with mortal ear. Now comes a tremendous gap wherein the scientist finds no foothold even for his imagination. Fancy that pendulum increasing its speed, faster and yet faster, till it has reached four hundreds of millions of millions of vibrations in one second, and mortal man once again senses its movement, but this time not as sound but as color. He calls his first vision red. Then following the chromatic scale a few more hundreds of hundreds of millions of vibrations he first senses violet, and then becomes blind. He has discovered that on one side of his sight limit heat rays sparkle and burn, and he guesses to-day that beyond the other boundary is the home of the X-Ray which laughs at the so-called invisible. But what of that huge gap which has never been claimed by God or man? Intelligence has accepted and acknowledged sense limitation as the foundation of personality. Personality is of course itself a limitation of manhood, and the finite will always be limited. But herein is the trouble. It is all right and natural that manhood should have powers that commence at one end and finish off at the other. But why there should be a huge gap in the middle is the mystery, or rather the problem, waiting a reasonable explanation.

Give a musician a piano with just a couple of notes at one end and a part of an octave at the other as all he can use, and you will have but poor attempts at melody, and a great deal of disharmony as the result. Now suppose a visitor from some other and more favored planet were to see such an instrument and learn that it expressed man's limitation, he would at once infer that there were notes and octaves somewhere that could and might fill up the gap, and let the soul of the musician sing its higher melodies. The visitor would say to the mortal: "You have been accepting this gap as made by natural law, whereas your effort should be to reach out from either end of your instrument, adding note to note, and at every discovery increasing the musician's power of expression." Among those he addressed there would be two classes of minds alike interested. One would say "the gap in our instrument is God's design. Let it alone. Religion forbids your intermeddling." The other class would simply keep toiling on, and finding a new note now and then till, perhaps, a whole octave might have been gained in the name and by the efforts of science. But even then the awful gap remains as a disheartening fact practically unchanged. The idea of a piano is itself a limitation. Let the reader think of an instrument a mile long, with mortal man sounding a few notes at each end, and a great silence between; he will then realize more clearly this great gap and what it means to himself and others. Man is an Ego, ever seeking to express himself by every means at his disposal, and, speaking for myself and the reader, Ego rebels at a limitation which may, after all, be one of ignorance only. Man is continuing to accept things for just what they appear to be, at least until he finds out to the contrary. Thus to-day he calls himself lord of creation, although he can only use a few notes at each end of his sense instrument, and has an awful gap of emptiness between one end and the other. This is the position which I want to discuss and examine, with a divine discontent at my own limitation.

Space has long been counted as filled with nothingness. Five or six miles climb from ocean's level left man gasping for breath, and a mile or two further was the limit even to bird life. Man has now discovered that space is full—absolutely full—without even a tiny crack, of a substance which is the reality of the All in All, and of which matter is but the passing shadow. Man in his ignorance has talked of empty space between sun, planet and distant star. It was for him just one of the huge gaps, like the one we note in sense limitation, only very much larger. Man the student and explorer now knows there is no gap at all, but just a solid roadway, over which the trained mind may travel back and forth. With his telescopic and spectroscopic motor wagon man wends his way to and fro, stopping if he pleases at comet and asteroid way stations. Or, if he prefer, he travels inward to further and further homes of intelligence and activity. With such experiences the scientist now tells us the great gap in space was imagination and born of ignorance. But all the same that scientist does not yet dare to deny the gap in his own sense limit which leaves him a few thousands of vibrations on one shore, with millions of millions on the other, and all between just nothing at all. At this point the careful student may find a thought of comfort. He now knows, as a fact, that the space between planet and star is filled with ether waves, vibratory with energy. But man himself is immersed in ether as much as is sun, planet or star. So there can be no more vacuum for him than for space. His senses are merely manifestations of his own divine energy. At one end the coarse atmosphere vibrates for him into sound. At the other he discovers it is ether waves vibrating with beauty and love. But there is—there can be—no gap between, since ether is the universal All in All, and man himself lives in it, moves in it and thinks in it. The gap has been the imagination of ignorance—the auto-suggestion which has held him in the same quicksand which buried his grandfather. But all the same the fact remains to-day that man does not seem to have gained many octaves out of the millions that lay between his hearing and his sight. This both demands and justifies a careful examination of manhood itself in the light of the recent discovery that Nature has no such thing as a vacuum, or even a crevice, in her whole system.

We commence with the question "What is man?" That is an old, a very old question, and has been answered in two ways. One is that he is the direct creation of a Supreme Divinity. The other, that he is the evoluted result of aggregations of atoms, and that his brain secretes thought as his liver secretes bile. Neither answer is satisfactory, for both alike leave unfilled this awful gap between his sense limitations. Taking nature as a whole we find intelligence everywhere, but we only perceive it atmosphere may be charged with the form of energy we atmosphere may be charged with the force of energy we call "electricity," but it is only when it is personified into a brief flash that we recognize it and call it "lightning." Every manifestation of intelligence is a flash from the mighty whole. And in the light of an eternity, without either time or space, it matters not whether personified intelligence count years by centuries or millions, it is still only a flash, moving in ether-filled space, and subject to its laws.

Such to me is manhood. I count it as a flash of the universal and divine intelligence, born amidst the eternal energy, which has rippled the ether into waves. Another effect of the eternal energy is to compel vortex rings or minute whirls of ether, known to us all as the atom of physical science. So the flash of intelligence, compelled by an energy we call First Cause, because we cannot comprehent it, is playing amidst the ether as lightning plays amid the atmosphere of our planet. But where the ether is whirled into atoms intelligence finds a quick limit. A little sound, smell, taste and touch are the possible manifestations of intelligence amid such cramped conditions. But thought and will power are children of the ether, and compel tiny waves that travel on and on through frictionless space. They linger for a brief hour amidst the atoms, manifesting as sight, normal or astral, but soon pass on and out, becoming the spiritual glow which ennobles manhood.

Such is my answer to the question "What is man?" But this answer also involves an explanation of the great gap that separates man's lower and higher self in the life of to-day. Physical sight is necessarily as material as hearing, although born of waves of ether instead of matter. It is through physical organs that man the mortal uses each of his five senses. And whatever other faculties man may possess they must, in earth life, find physical expression or remain silent. So we have as an acknowledged fact a human personality, expressing itself through vibration of material atoms, as the mouthpiece of an Ego who has apparently no other inlet into earth life. We have the further fact that this personality uses, or seems to use, just a few vibrations at each end of a key-board, with no reason, that we can discern, for this extraordinary limitation. The personality is man, with a most limited manhood, but there is no reason, we can discover, why Ego should have this marvelous limitation. As a matter of common sense, Ego, being himself personified intelligence, can have no other limitation than the laws of ether and matter compel. There can be no gap in his forceful grasp between one note in the scale of vibrations and another. He must play upon one as easily as upon the others. The only reason of the apparent gap is the limitation of our earth-bound sense, which stops short suddenly, as if it were cut off for the very purpose of making man the mortal a ridiculous parody of what he should be if Ego were in full control.

There are plenty of proofs of the presence of Ego within this gap, where man and Nature have seemed to be silent. All the phenomena of psychometry, the whole field of psychic manifestation, which includes clairvoyance, all that we call intuition, and that which is called "subconsciousness," are founded upon vibrations that are outside our normal limit. And the reason they are so imperfectly manifested, so full of errors and perplexities, is because mortal man translates, or tries to translate them into the vibratory expressions of his everyday life. So let us ever remember that Ego is a flash from the infinite, and cannot be limited to just a few octaves of expression on the mighty keyboard of the universe.

It should now be evident that Ego can strike one chord as well as another, although mortal mind may be silent to one, and count the other as his limit. This gives me quite a different idea of my own personality. I now remember, with glorified humility, that I am an Ego, expressing myself in earth life with so few notes that there is necessarily more of inharmony than melody. All that I have counted woe, misery, and fated cruelty in earth life is based upon my inability to sense the other notes by which my Ego is expressing himself to his brother intelligences. Let us ever remember that every imperfect chord proclaims a perfect chord somewhere awaiting the student's search. Cruelty and hate are only imperfect chords which in fullness would express brotherly love. All the same we have to-day these limitations in our earth life. Things are not what they seem to be in our manhood any more than in the expressions of nature around us. And our Ego is, and has been thus misjudged only because we do not see and grasp enough of him to realize that what is called "devil" is only a very imperfect manifestation of godhood.

It is a great advance when we have grasped even a thought of the powers that necessarily belong to every Ego, but that is only the threshold of our theme. I call my theme "The Fullness of Man," because I recognize man the mortal as but a very limited expression of the man Ego, who is himself a flash of the divine. I believe that man in his fulness can play every note in the vast scale. The melody may be outside our limited grasp of to-day but I count it as a present reality to be taken into account in our everyday study of "spirit return" and its problems. It is for me the one great factor in telepathic contact between mortal and spirit, as well as between mortal and mortal. And as this is an existing and ever present reality of to-day, I confess myself but little interested in what seem to me fanciful conceptions of future reincarnation. My interest is centered on the possible incarnations which are, or may be expressing my personality to-day.

Now let us as students mark the point we have reached. We have accepted as a most natural assumption that man the Ego can have no such gap in his powers as is apparently the case in earth life. We have noted that for the mortal his hearing is the effect of but a few thousands of vibrations, while his sight demands millions of millions, with no apparent connecting foothold for human intelligence. Man the mortal is thus touching matter with one sense, and ether with another. And yet further let us remember that man, whether mortal or spirit, will ever be a personified intelligence which we call Ego.

It is obvious that if matter be, as is claimed, but one expression of ether then Ego has a broad field for his experiences, which experiences can only be connected in the Ego himself, and not in any of his personalities. For instance, if an Ego be to-day, as I claim, playing upon his instrument and using every note and octave, we, his neighbors or brethren, could sense no more of him than is permitted by the limitations of the matter in which we are now living. Where we enter the silence the Ego is in full activity. He who could once reach a position where he might witness this manifestation of Ego would perceive him at work by will power, thus both causing and using the vibratory waves of the ether to express his intelligence. I mean that this expression by Ego of his greater fulness is necessarily going on Now. Where the silence begins for the mortal, Ego is expressing a new personality, but only because we are not yet broad enough to see and sense that the two personalities are but manifestations of the one Ego, in operation at the same time.

It is here that Psychical Research has blundered its way along through a few vibrations, and out into the dark and silent sense limit of the poor mortal. It thus becomes necessary to examine a little into the experiences called "spirit return." When the Universal Intelligence has flashed out into the frictionless ether it becomes, necessarily, a personality of vast, but still finite, breadth and limitation. And since the ether is frictionless this personality is necessarily unlimited by time. The Ego must thus stand as a huge personality to any intelligence capable of sensing the entire outburst and its effect. But to the onlooker less advanced there will appear only so much or so many a personality as his limited vision can grasp at one time. So we poor mortals are just wee, puny, human personalities to ourselves, because that is all we can perceive to-day of our grand divine whole. Nevertheless the reader and I are Egos with experiences going on at this very moment that are outside our mortal sense limit. The day is soon coming for each of us when our point of view will become less limited. We call that "death." Then we necessarily become conscious of a broader manhood working in more or less of the great vibratory gap which we have noted as impossible to the mortal.

We can further discern that Ego is practically unaffected by death. He was manifesting amid vibrations before, and he is manifesting amid vibrations still; so to himself the only change is that the one personality we call mortal has ceased to be an expression of his intelligence. We call this personality which is thus active after death "spirit," and can now perceive that it finds itself in a position that has not yet been noted either by the Society for Psychical Research or by the mere worshiper of spirit return. In the first place his present experiences are not new to him. He has been living them all the time he was a mortal, although the personality was not the same. Of course when the mortal dies the intelligence cannot at once make the connection between the two personalities, although the Ego himself has needed both for a complete expression of his manhood. Necessarily the existing spirit personality can only have any record or impressions of earth experiences through the Ego. But the Ego can himself only record them in the vibrations amid which they were gathered.

In the mortal life we have a mental personality whose experiences must have been largely a dream to the personality beyond. The two personalities have undoubtedly mingled and blended in dreams and psychic experiences, and when one ceases the other goes on much as before. The mortal at last becomes immortal. His experiences are now, as it were, merged into the personality that has been playing all the time inside the awful vibratory gap. For a time, perhaps, he struggles to maintain his individuality and go on using the old vibrations. What a mess he makes of it is recorded in the history of spirit return. If he can find a suitable instrument he struggles to record and repeat his mortal experiences, and usually fails to establish his own identity, at least to the satisfaction of a careful student. Yet his struggle tells the tale that manhood is not what it appears to be to mortals in earth life, but is only a limited expression of a vast reality. As a returning spirit he can bring almost nothing of thought or experiences from life within the gap, because they necessarily belong to those vibrations where the mortal has no foothold. Our visitor must talk from the mortal standpoint into mortal ear, and amidst such limitations the personality, who while a mortal had exhibited a grand intelligence among his fellows, now comes back, halting and confused with his effort to even make himself known.

Yet again, there had been and still is a psychic connection between the two personalities. We already recognize the subconscious self as a reality, but we find it just what it must be under these conditions. It comes as a mentality in most respects inferior to that of the mortal because, at its best, it is not playing amid its own normal sense vibrations. So it can express but a shadow of its real powers, but all the same it is another personality of the same Ego.

Let me here ask the reader to picture a performer on a grand organ, with a theme and execution worthy of the greatest artist known to earth life. Let the instrument be so constructed that only a few notes at either end of the scale are audible to the student who is listening. Occasionally there will be harmony, but, for the most part, discords and even absurd rhythms will greet the ear. That listener represents mortal life. Yonder sit other listeners whose normal hearing is adapted to the very notes to which our mortal student has been deaf. They listen with rapture because vastly more of the theme is aglint with soul melody for them. Yet, here and there, to them also there is sad imperfection for lack of the very tones our mortal student is grasping. These are the experiences of spirit life.

The one who plays, to whom every note is alike an expression of his soul, is realizing a divine ecstasy as he thus experiences somewhat of infinite harmony and love. That player is Ego. Your Ego, reader, and mine.

Such is life, mortal and immortal. And such it becomes in its one-ness, instead of the fragmentary manifestations upon which theology, philosophy and even science has each sought foothold.

I catch a moan from some of my readers who insist that whatever may happen they want to cling to the feelings, emotions and experiences of to-day. It is like a child refusing to become a man lest he forget the details of his childhood. Yet such a moaning cry is quite natural to the present limited personality. But the feeling and the cry are alike absurd to Ego, for, as we have seen, he has never in reality had any such limitation. This mortal personality has only been an appearance, founded on the whirls of ether, called atoms of matter, in which he has posed as a mortal. Ego will have just as many personalities as the substance he uses for expression may compel. But he is himself a mighty whole—finite but divine—always and everywhere expressed as fragmentary personalities, each to be weighed and measured by the student who would estimate "the fullness of manhood."

HOME CIRCLES.

Directions for Forming and Conducting Circles for Development.

The first conditions to be observed relate to the persons who compose the circle. These should be, as far as possible, of opposite temperaments, as positive and negative; of moral characters, pure minds, and not marked by repulsive points of either physical or mental condition. No person suffering from disease, or of debilitated physique, should be present at any circle, unless it is formed expressly for healing purposes. I would recommend the number of the circle never to be less than three, or more than twelve. The best number is eight. No person of a strong positive temperament should be present, as any such magnetic spheres emanating from the circle will overpower that of the spirits who must always be positive in the circle in order to produce phenomena.

Never let the apartment be over-heated, the room should be well ventilated. Avoid strong light, which, by producing motion in the atmosphere, disturbs the manifestations. A subdued light is the most favorable for spiritual magnetism.

I recommend the seance to be opened either with prayer or a song sung in chorus, after which subdued, harmonizing conversation is better than wearisome silence; but let the conversation be directed towards the purpose of the gathering, and never sink into discussion or rise to emphasis. Always have a pencil and paper on the table, avoid entering or quitting the room, irrelevant conversation, or disturbances within or without the circle after the seance has commenced.

Do not admit unpunctual comers, nor suffer the air of the room to be disturbed after the sitting commences. Nothing but necessity, indisposition, or impressions, should warrant the disturbance of the sitting, which should never exceed two hours, unless an extension of time be solicited by the spirits.

Let the seance always extend to one hour, even if no results are obtained; it sometimes requires that time for spirits to form their battery. Let it be also remembered that circles are experimental, hence no one should be discouraged if phenomena are not produced at the first few sittings. Stay with the same circle for six sittings; if no phenomena are then produced you may be sure you are not assimilated to each other; in that case, let the members meet with other persons until you succeed.

A well-developed test medium may sit without injury for any person, but a circle sitting for mutual development should never admit persons addicted to bad habits, strongly positive or dogmatical. A candid inquiring spirit is the only proper frame of mind in which to sit for phenomena, the delicate magnetism of which is made or marred as much of mental as physical conditions.

Impressions are the voices of spirits or the monitions of the spirit within us, and should always be followed out, unless suggestive of wrong act or word. At the opening of the circle, one or more are often impressed to change seats with others. One or more are impressed to withdraw, or a feeling of repulsion makes it painful to remain. Let these impressions be faithfully regarded, and pledge each other that no offense shall be taken by following impressions.

If a strong impression to write, speak, sing, dance, or gesticulate possess any mind present, follow it out faithfully. It has a meaning if you cannot at first realize it. Never feel hurt in your own person, nor ridicule your neighbor for any failures to express or discover the meaning of the spirit impressing you.

Spirit control is often deficient, and at first imperfect. By often yielding to it, your organism becomes more flexible, and the spirit more experienced; and practice in control is necessary for spirits as well as mortals. If dark and evil disposed spirits manifest to you, never drive them away, but always strive to elevate them, and treat them as you would mortals, under similar circumstances. Do not always attribute falsehoods to "lying spirits," or deceiving mediums. Many mistakes occur in the communion of which you cannot always be aware.

Unless charged by spirits to do otherwise do not continue to hold sittings with the same parties for more than a twelvemonth. After that time, if not before, fresh elements of magnetism are essential. Some of the original circle should withdraw, and others take their places.

Never seek the spirit circle in a trivial or deceptive spirit. Then, and then only, have you cause to fear it.

Never permit any one to sit in circles who suffer from it in health or mind. Magnetism in the case of such persons is a drug, which operates perniciously, and should be carefully avoided.

Every seventh person can be a medium of some kind, and become fully developed through the judicious operations of the spirit circle. When once mediums are fully developed, the circle sometimes becomes injurious to them. When they feel this to be the case, let none be offended if they withdraw, and only use their gifts in other times and places.

All persons are subject to spirit influence and guidance, but only one in seven can so externalize this power as to become what is called a medium; and let it ever be remembered that trance speakers, no less than mediums for any other gift, can never be influenced by spirits far beyond their own normal capacity in the matter of the intelligence rendered, the magnetism of the spirits being but a quickening fire, which inspires the brain, and, like a hot-house process on plants, forces into prominence latent powers of the mind, but creates nothing. Even in the case of merely automatic speakers, writers, rapping, and other forms of test mediumship, the intelligence of the spirit is measurably shaped by the capacity and idiosyncrasies of the medium. All spirit power is limited in expression by the organism through which it works, and spirits may control, inspire, and influence the human mind, but do not change or re-create it.

IDIOSYNCRASIES.

In Relation to Moral Conduct

In The Progressive Thinker of April 14, Prof. B. F. Underwood has an article on "Morality by Legislation." He says, "Legislation is not the scientific, effective method. The true way to improve conditions is to teach and enforce morals in the nursery, the home, the higher grades of instruction, and the private life of the individual."

And further says: "The moral progress is a process of inward growth which results from experience and knowledge."

He is eminently right in saying morality is a product of experience and knowledge. He could have gone further and said there are as many different moralities as there are individual experiences. One parent sends his boy to school with the command not to fight with the other boys. This is the morality of this parent. The next parent has a different morality, and tells his boy if the other boys fight him and he doesn't fight back and lick 'em, he will lick him when he comes home.

In some homes it is better morality to stroll the green fields Sundays than to step on the threshold of any church. In other homes the reverse morality prevails.

Some distinguished minds declare that tobacco is worth more to the world, morally, than potatoes.

Vivisection is moral in some schools, and immoral in others.

Suicide, under certain circumstances, with some, is moral; with many others it possesses no moral side.

In some homes it is taught there is no moral ground for divorce. Other homes teach there are more than a dozen moral grounds for it.

Vaccination is moral here, and immoral there.

In one of the thirteen original states of the Union, Sunday kissing was immoral. Now the morality of all the states permits unlimited Sunday kissing.

Polygamy is moral in Utah, and immoral in Congress.

To tell white lies is moral in many nurseries and homes. In many others it is immoral.

In France it is good morality to bring children up on wine. In Germany the moral sentiment raises children on beer. In the United States children come up under all manner of moral theories.

For nineteen centuries the church, in stentorian tones, has preached and coaxed and threatened for greater morality. In all these centuries the church has been unsuccessful in its endeavor to establish a general moral standard.

Where Prof. Underwood would enforce morals in the nursery, the home, and the school, as the profoundest method of progress, it sounds to me like the old musty church talk. I may be wrong. I think the morals of all of us change as the view-point changes. If this is true, then the Brother's formula becomes a simple platitude.

Within the last thirty years I have heard the highest Christian sentiment in the land repeatedly declare the teachings of Prof. Underwood immoral. I don't believe it. But suppose it true. Then surely he is not the man to set the moral pace for the nursery, the home, and the school.

However able Brother Underwood might be to frame a code of morals applicable to everybody; and should he call together a World's Parliament of Moralities to pronounce on it, I doubt if it would agree that he is in harmony with the sciences. "When doctors disagree, who shall decide?" The scientists decide not to wait longer for the church to study out the question of what is abstract morality, for the reason that the church never studies. It begins and ends with "Thus saith the Lord."

Now a word about the Professor's conscience telling him that legislation is a thing of doubtful value. He says, "where the moral sentiment is deep, law is unnecessary." When I read of the million dollars the Vanderbilt heirs, of Cornelius, had paid to the state, under the inheritance tax law, I wonder how many million years it would take to educate into the souls of those heirs a sufficiently deep moral sentiment to have made them paid that, in the absence of law. When I read that the New Zealand Republic is so much in advance of ours that you can live easier there on a hundred dollars than on a thousand here, I wonder if deep moral sentiment, and no legislation, did it all?

Brother Underwood speaks especially of Temperance prohibition legislation. I read that when man made his advent on this little speck of earth, he had neither a liquor appetite, nor law, and yet he fell. Jesus understood man's frailty better. He pleaded and prayed with God not to lead his pleasure-loving children into temptation. I read of children born with an aversion to drink, that are gradually lead by associates into drinking; and, lastly, they fill drunkards' graves. The Brother, however, may be right.

On another point, just a single word. It is the question of education. Brother Underwood says, "Pain is the artist's chisel which has shaped and beautified humanity." Other expressions in connection with this show that he believes the greater the pain the better the education. In support of this view he quotes Tennyson:

Of their dead selves to higher things."

We know that pain has been a powerful chisel in the hand of the schoolmaster of the past; and it suggests that both Brother Underwood and Mr. Tennyson were educated in that school, and that both refuse to believe there is something better. It suggests that neither of them are versed in the new school theory, which is to make study pleasing and attractive, instead of painful.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Bro. Toler writes from Marietta, Ohio: "Our beautiful little city of from 15,000 to 18,000 population, and rapidly growing, has many churches with their attendant supply of superstition and bigotry, but no regular Spiritualist society. Just at present, however, we are enjoying a feast of reason and flow of soul. Mrs. E. J. Demorest, an inspirational and clairvoyant medium, of Pittsburg, Pa., is here. Last evening a few of the friends of our beautiful philosophy held a circle at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McNanna. Mrs. Demorest was present, and her charming talk was greatly enjoyed. She is an intelligent, modest and refined lady. One event of significance occurred while Mrs. D. was here last year, which has borne fruit. Mr. Charles Best, a prominent gentleman of this city, met her then, and in their conversation she remarked: 'I see you are an Ingersoll man,' and to which he assented. She then said to him: 'Your friend, Mr. Ingersoll, is going to die soon (in two or three months) very suddenly.' Her prediction came to pass. Mr. Best has ever since then been inclined to investigate Spiritualism in a quiet way. Several other materialists here with whom I am well acquainted are becoming eager to read the shining pages of The Progressive Thinker. Some of the preachers, both orthodox and heterodox, are intensely interested in perusing the paper, especially the inspirational lectures and Petersilea and Ingersoll letters. A few of the Methodist and some other church people here have been trying to investigate the consoling truth of spirit return in a very quiet way."

The New Orleans Times-Democrat says: "The recent death of Prof. J. H. Pepper, who was known far and wide as the originator of 'Pepper's ghost,' recalls a whimsical experience of my early days as a showman," said a visiting theatrical manager. "'Pepper's ghost' was the original name of the ingenious optical illusion which is produced by tilting a sheet of glass before a stage and reflecting images in it from a brighly lighted space below and in front, which is out of sight of the audience. You have seen your face at nighttime in a window pane, haven't you, apparently projected out into the darkness beyond? Well, the priciple is exactly the same, and by darkening the hall the reflection can be made to seem as real and substantial as anything else on the stage. One of my first experiences in the show business was as manager of a Pepper ghost exhibition. We carried two sheets of glass, each 8 by 8 feet, and, fitted together, they filled the front of a small stage. The illusions we produced were really very clever, and the entertainment wound up with a sort of allegory called 'The Drunkard's Dream.' The drunkard was seen seated at a table asleep, and gradually a horrible human wreck materialized out of thin air at his side. The figure was supposed to be an apparition of his future self, and the moral was obvious. We were giving this exhibition for a week's stand in a little town in Mississippi, when some wag told a notorious local sot that the spectre was intended as a caricature of himself. The poor fool believed it and attended next night, armed with half a brick. When the ghost appeared he rose suddenly in his seat and hurled the missile straight at its head. There was a tremendous crash of broken glass, as both sheets shivered to pieces, and the vision instantly disappeared. The fellow had no idea, of course, that there was anything in front of the stage, and the scene of ruin scared him so badly that he jumped head first out of a window, ran blindly down the road, fell into a creek and was drowned. The loss of the glass broke up the show. If we had continued, we might have had a real drunkard's ghost on our hands."

The Baltimore (Md.) News says: "A very clever performance was given by Zanoni, the mind reader, at the Academy of Music Concert Hall last night. Zanoni stated that it was his first public exhibition. Gentlemen in the audience who had seen the famous Washington Irving Bishop say that in their opinion the feats accomplished by Zanoni were fully as mysterious as those of Bishop, and were done without the appearance of suffering, which was one of Bishop's characteristics. Zanoni's most mysterious performance, perhaps, was the blindfold test. He was taken from the room with his eyes bandaged while the committee selected a certain letter in a certain word on a certain page of a book and gave the book to a gentleman who sat on it. A pin was given to a lady in the audience, and when Zanoni was brought back he experienced but little difficulty in finding both pin and book, turning over the leaves until he found the correct page and sticking the pin in the letter "a" of the word "theatre" on page 322, pronouncing the word plainly before the bandage was taken from his eyes. The word, letter and page were those selected by the committee."

H. M. E. writes: "The meetings of the Court Street Spiritualist Society of Saginaw, Mich., in G. A. R. Hall, are a success. They are well attended, and great interest is manifested both in the lectures and readings. Many are so interested they say to our speaker, 'I wish you could talk longer.' We are gaining some new members, and hope to be able to form a lyceum before long."

The full name and address of every peson who sends an item for this department, must be given, or otherwise it may not appear. Bear that in mind.

Mrs. Henrietta L. Lichtig writes from Springfield, Mo.: "It is not often that you hear of us. We believe it best if one can only have a little in this world to have that little good, and we carry this belief in our spiritual work as well. We have had with us Mrs. Maud Lord Drake. She lectured and gave spirit descriptions twice on Sunday and was assisted by her husband, Mr. J. S. Drake, who is an able and interesting speaker. During the week she held three seances which were very satisfactory. Many were brought into a knowledge of spirit return through her wonderful powers. She has promised to return to us before leaving for their California home, and many anxious ones are awaiting the fulfillment of that promise."

The Marquette (Mich.) Mining Journal says: "Marquette has a seven days' wonder in the person of Mrs. Wright, of Detroit, a Spiritualist. She has been here the past week and will remain for some time. She has held a number of seances and during the past few days has succeeded in mystifying the skeptics and delighting persons who profess a belief in the doctrines of the sect which maintains that disembodied spirits roam the earth after being parted from their bodies. She is what is termed a trumpet medium, the spirit voices in a majority of instances emanating from a tin trumpet, although some spirits have scorned to talk through so material an instrument and have floated their voices on the still air of the room in which the seances have been held. There is much discussion of the manifestations, the skeptics endeavoring to explain them to their own satisfaction and others frankly expressing mystification."

J. W. Kenyon writes: "After a hard winter's work on the spiritual rostrum I return to this beautiful and famous camp ground, Onset, Mass., where Mrs. Kenyon and myself will hold day meetings for tests and instruction in Spiritualism, in Phylis Hall, as we did last season. During the past winter Mrs. Kenyon has given tests and I have lectured in the following places: Six Sundays in Manchester, N. H.; six in Haverhill; four in Worcester; four in Lawrence; Rochester, N. Y.; West Derry, N. H.; Pawtucket, R. I., and Brocton. This month Mrs. Kenyon is in Leominster and Worcester, Mass. Societies wishing our services for 1900 and 1901 address us at Onset, Mass., P. O. Box 166."

Virginie Barrett writes: "I have a few more open dates for camps and societies. I will serve as speaker, test, and soloist. I will make terms reasonable. I would like to hear from camps. Address me at 822 Rebecca street, Allegheny, Pa. Home address, 819 East Sixteenth street, Indianapolis, Ind."

The Fort Wayne (Ind.) News has the following from Muncie, Ind.: "In connection with the death of Miss Leona Boerner, a 17-year-old girl, of Dunkirk, which occurred in this city at the home of James Marsh, Friday morning, is a peculiar story. The young girl had been an invalid for the last four years. About three months ago she had a dream that she was going to Marion, where she would take medical treatment, and that she would have her health restored. She also had a presentiment that she would take suddenly ill again within two months after her recovery, and that she would die shortly afterwards. To add to the mystery of the case, another dream which the girl had a week ago was to the effect that she would die within a week. The announcement of her death on Friday is a demonstration that the dreams became true."

Wm. F. Ruffel, a medium who excels in private as well as in public work, was duly ordained as minister of the Gospel by the Church of the Students of Nature, May 6.

Moses Hull has induced the First Spiritual Church to let him off during September, so that he and Mrs. Hull are open for engagements at camps and elsewhere for the last Sunday in August and the five Sundays of September. Address him at Lily Dale, N. Y.

Rev. T. W. Woodrow is engaged for the camp-meeting at Marshalltown, Ia., and desires to arrange with the committee to serve at the camp-meeting at Clinton. He desires engagements at all Western Spiritualist camps. Correspondence solicited. Address him at No. 1115 Garfield avenue, Kansas City, Kansas. Mr. Woodrow is an able exponent of our cause.

Geo. L. Congdon writes from Elgin, Ill.: "We of Elgin have been partially asleep for some time, for many reasons, one being that so many representatives of our beautiful philosophy have so conducted themselves that we have been busy apologizing to the outsiders for the questionable conduct of the mountebanks. Some of them have come from Chicago, we are sorry to say. We have, however, been highly entertained and stimulated by Mr. G. F. Perkins, who is from your city, and who lectured last Sunday afternoon and evening. We are glad to say that he gave us great satisfaction by his able lectures and tests. His work is valuable to the cause. Can't you let him come and stay with us?"

Maggie Waite writes from Springfield, Mass.: "On Wednesday evening, May 2, the Ladies' Auxiliary gave me a public reception in Graves' Hall, where the time was pleasantly spent in playing whist and dancing until midnight, when refreshments were served. I closed my meetings last Sunday evening, May 6, to a crowded hall, after laboring here eight weeks. On that occasion I gave a short talk on my conversion from Catholicism to Spiritualism, followed by my usual seance. Mr. Wellman Whitney gave readings from articles and excelled himself. I can be addressed here until further notice, at 23 Main street."

Mrs. H. M. Young writes from Washington, D. C.: "Mr. Grumbine continues his ministrations here during May and despite the warm weather the audiences crowd the large and ample Masonic Temple Hall. His success here among all classes of people has developed the conviction that the truth of the spiritual movement as he expounds it, is the truth of the coming years, and that the people desire it above everything else. The classes are the largest that he ever spoke to in Washington, and these as well as the public lectures the very best people attend. No one who looks over these large audiences can deny that the people are rallying to his standard. In Rauscher's hall, on Connecticut avenue, he speaks at 4 p. m. every alternate Sunday, before the Circle of Divine Ministry, and the best people of the fashionable quarter of Washington fill this beautiful hall to hear him. This organization has espoused Mr. Grumbine's work, yet it is not Spiritualistic. Mr. Wood, the president of the First Society of Spiritualists is Mr. Grumbine's warmest friend, as is Mr. Hooker and Mr. Bacon, both loyal Spiritualists." If Mr. Grumbine's work is not Spiritualistic, then what is it? If not "Spiritualistic," then it is anti-"Spiritualistic," or neither. If neither Spiritualistic nor anti-Spiritualistic, what claim has he to a place on the Spiritualist rostrum, or to the special patronage of Spiritualists, only as they seek information outside of Spiritualistic lines? No doubt in that respect he is highly entertaining, and will find a large constituency.

Brother Clark writes from Lansing, Mich.: "Mrs. M. C. Lincoln, of Buffalo, has closed her month's work for April. We listened to ten lectures in April, which were of a high order. She will return and work with our society through the month of December, 1900. Mrs. L. N. Claman, of Kansas City, last Sunday, began her engagement with our society for the month of May."

Della B. Platt writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "The First Spiritualists Church of Battle Creek, Mich., are especially favored in having with them the past month Mrs. C. F. Weatherford, a noble worker in the cause of truth and right. She lectured to large and appreciative audiences every Sunday evening and has awakened an interest here by her earnest work and deep, clear-cut thoughts, which appeal to the best in every soul. She also did much good in her class work, teaching each one how best to receive healing from the higher intelligences. We should be glad could we retain her services for a much longer season, and we bespeak her a cordial welcome in any society."

Mrs. S. E. Tripp has removed to 207 36th street, corner Rhodes avenue, first flat, where she will be pleased to see all her friends.

H. D. Simons sends us a large list of subscribers from Cambridgport, Mass. Another list comes from Smithton, Pa., sent by J. Smith. Several others have responded nobly, and thus the good work goes on.

Dr. Carlos Wright writes from Joseph, Oregon: "Chief Joseph, who with his tribe formerly occupied this (Wallowa Valley) but now has a reservation further North, is a wise old Indian, and could give some of the reverends hints that are not to be despised. Since the Nez Perces campaign, in which he exhibited generalship outclassing General Howard, he has kept strictly to his compact with the Government, which, as usual, Uncle Sam has not done with the Indian. Joseph is now asking for simple justice, and honesty on the part of the Government; and among other matters he asks for school-houses to be built on his reservation, but no churches. In explanation of this, he said: 'I fear the ministers would teach my people to quarrel about God. We quarrel about men sometimes, but we never quarrel about the Great Spirit whom we worship.'"

A. S. Hudson, M. D., late of California, has removed to Mt. Vernon, Ohio. He is one of the advanced thinkers.

Mrs. Hannah Olsen writes that the friends would like a test medium in Primghar, Iowa.

Will C. Hodge can be addressed for engagements at 40 Loomis street, Chicago. He has open dates until July 15. From this date time is all taken until September. He is open for engagement for the fall and winter months, and will respond to all calls for funerals.

An intelligent man of Washington, D. C., who has written books, who has held high official station, who is known well as a public speaker, receives from time to time communications through what he considers supernatural agencies. This man is not a Spiritualist in the ordinary, every-day sense. He is not dependent upon mediums—things are revealed to him as he sits alone in his room. Not long ago he had a vision which forecasted for him one of the severest defeats of the British in South Africa. He saw one of the checks of Buller's army, when the campaign to relieve Ladysmith took its most disastrous turn. But the most notable communication of his was one of the world's forecasts, as follows: "The coming century will see remarkable, wonderful changes in governments and religion. The different branches of the Christian church will come closer to one another. The love of God will bring man nearer to brotherhood. Sectarian bitterness will, in great part, be wiped out. Within the next quarter of a century a great upheaval of European governments will take place. Republican governments will be the rule, monarchy the exception, at the opening of the second quarter of the century. Queen Victoria will die very suddenly. The Prince of Wales will come to the throne. After a short reign he will die by violence. He came nearer death last week than the world knows. The Duke of York will succeed him, and be the last of the line of monarchs of Great Britain for the present. A republic will be established in England in about fifteen years. India will be lost to Great Britain in the meantime. After the loss of India, a rapid decline of the power of the government of Great Britain will take place. France will have comparative peace and prosperity, with a stable republican government, for at least twenty-five years to come." The recipient of this forecast has unqualified faith in it. He seeks no personal notoriety. He prefers that his name should not be associated with it publicly, but he confidently consents to its publication.

Thos. Harding writes about the Sturgis (Mich.) June meeting: "It will be held, as heretofore, in the Free or Spiritual Church, Chicago street, Saturday and Sunday, 16th and 17th of June, 1900. These conventions, held to commemorate the dedication (to freedom of speech and religious liberty) of the Spiritual Church of Sturgis, have been kept up without a single missing link for over forty years. The house was erected at a time when every meeting-house door was closed against Spiritualism and independent thought and a free religious and secular platform was thus secured for the people of Southern Michigan. A cordial invitation is extended to all without reference to religious or philosophical predilection. "Come, let us reason together." Dr. J. M. Peebles, Mrs. Sheets and other speakers will be present to advocate our principles, and, once more, 'Fire the shot heard 'round the world."

Geo. F. Perkins writes: "I have succeeded in arousing the good people of Elgin, Ill., to quite an activity. May 6, I held two meetings there with excellent results, and was received with the attention and courtesy that is due any worker in our cause. There is a large number of excellent people who are good loyal Spiritualists, and I heard many favorable comments upon The Progressive Thinker and its methods. Among the many earnest and intelligent workers are Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Congdon, at whose hospitable home I was made welcome; also Mrs. S. C. Kipp, an energetic, true blue Spiritualist; Mrs. Van Meter, who presides at an excellent hotel for both mortal and immortals, makes you feel at home. There are many whose names I cannot recall that seemed enthusiastic in supporting our methods of presenting the philosophy of mediumship. The wonder-worker has lost his foothold, and tricks are below par in this beautiful city of Elgin. Mrs. Perkins has been assisted at the Beacon Light meetings, 40 E. Randolph street, Chicago, Sunday evenings, by Prof. Bechtel, Mr. Robinson, Mrs. Trafton, Mr. Thompson and others, and our Wednesday evening meetings, 675 Larrabee street, are very interesting. Two entertainments and ice cream socials are being prepared for May 30 and 31, on which evenings an excellent programme by local talent will be rendered, and a grand time is expected."

B. F. Hayden writes from Clear Lake, Iowa: "I arrived here and found Mrs. Hayden had succeeded in arousing quite an interest in the cause. Together we are holding three public meetings here a week, with quite a good attendance. We will likely organize a permanent society here at an early date. We would be glad to hear from parties, societies or camp managers wanting speaker and test medium. Would be glad to go out for week night meetings within 50 miles of Clear Lake during this month. We hope to secure work in the western states until fall. Can be addressed at Clear Lake, Ia., care of Box 23."

Visiting a patient last week in our city, Dr. Peebles dropped in upon us hale and vigorous as ever. The doctor is engaged to four camp-meetings this season in Michigan; to Freeville camp-meeting, in New York, and to the Maple Dell camp in Ohio. He attends the Ohio State Association the 23d and 24th of this month, in Columbus, O.; also the annual meeting in Sturgis, Mich., the 16th and 17. His new book, "Death Defeated," is selling well, and he has just put to press a new and important work to be entitled, "Vaccination a Curse, or a Menace to Personal Liberty." There is no busier man than the Doctor. If not attending to patients he is writing a book or making arrangements to travel in various foreign countries. His long and varied experience has placed him in the front ranks as an author, and as he expects his life prolonged until he shall have reached a century, many more books will probably emanate from his pen.

Mrs. Hamilton Gill, the well-known medium, will accept engagements for the summer and autumn months to lecture and give tests for societies and camp-meetings.

Henry H. Warner, inspirational trance speaker and test medium, spoke for the Englewood Spiritual Union, 420 Sixty-third street, Sunday, May 6, and is engaged for August 4 and 5 at Briggs' Park, Grand Rapids, Mich. Would like engagements for season of 1900 and 1901. Address 738 Kedzie avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. M. E. Kratz writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Owing to ill health and conditions in my home over which I had no control, I was compelled to cancel further engagement with the First Society of Spiritualists in Kansas City. I met many kind friends whom I shall always remember as being among the true and tried of our cause. It was my pleasure to attend the service held here in Howard Hall, on last Sabbath evening; Rev. Mr. Grimshaw was the speaker. Though frail in body he is a giant in power, and his inspirational discourses demonstrate his aspiration. This itinerant labor, giving only one month of time to societies, is surely very unsatisfactory, both to a society and the workers. It requires almost three Sundays to understand an audience, their wants and their desires. Let us look to our future interest for good, both as to the workers and societies. We have been in this rut sufficiently long to awaken to the fact that the best possible results cannot be obtained from plant, shrub or, mediumship, by this continuous transplanting."

H. H. Fross informs us that Harry J. Moore has been lecturing at the Ind. S. S. Home. He was followed with three lectures from Mrs. M. E. Sheets. Great interest was manifested.

The Hartford (Ct.) Telegram says: "Either Dr. Louis Schlesinger, the medium, who was present at the recent Spiritualist convention, is precisely what he pretends to be or else he is a thirty-second degree mind reader. The reporter selected the names of three deceased friends, the name of one living person, and, for luck, added that of Joan of Arc, as one of the most completely deceased persons on record. This name he wrote according to the French form, 'Jeanne d'Arc.' The folded slips were then thrown together in a hat and one drawn at random and given to the doctor. Without even glancing at the slip, he said that the person whose name it bore was alive, and giving the name without the slightest hesitation. When the next slip was handed him, the doctor remarked that the person whose name it bore was a woman and had been dead a long time, 'Her last name is 'Dark,' but the first name I cannot quite speak,' he added. He at last mastered the name and to the amazement of his hearers gave Joan's name with the proper French pronunciation. The balance of the names were plain sailing to the doctor who occasionally threw a descriptive remark or gave the correct name of the deceased person. And just how he did it is yet a mystery to the reporter."

G. W. Kates and wife held a meeting in Currie, Minn., Sunday, May 6, and rested for a few days at the farm home of Elias Howard, where in pastoral pursuits they temporarily forgot the human souls and realized the need of helping to develop the spiritual quality of animal and vegetable entities. They say that humanity needs a purer class of food, freed from grossness, before a spiritual race of men shall inhabit the earth. Soul-reform must begin with physical purification. Mr. and Mrs. Kates held well-attended meetings at Marshall, Minn., May 11 and 13. During June and July they expect to hold a number of grove meetings. All of August they are engaged for Ohio and Michigan camp-meetings.

Dr. A. M. G. Wheeler, having closed his meetings at Louisville, Ky., is open for engagements. Address him there at 718 Jackson street, for engagements.

Mrs. J. M. Smith writes from California: "I have been a subscriber to your valuable paper for eight years, and my husband and myself feel that we cannot do without it. It keeps us in touch with the world in that particular line of thought. I have three premium books."

The People's Church Record of Santa Rosa, Cal., says: "On Sunday evening the pulpit in the People's Christian Church, Armory Hall, was occupied by Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, of San Francisco, who delivered an eminently interesting and eloquent lecture on 'Occult Science, the Key to the Soul's Inheritance.' It was the first time this subject has been treated before a Santa Rosa audience, and the appreciation of the large congregation was marked, Mrs. Ballou being applauded at the close of her lecture. As an appropriate introduction to the lecture, the minister, Jay William Hudson, read a poem from Mrs. Ballou's volume, 'Driftwood.' The lecturer introduced her subject by emphasizing the power of mind above all other phenomena and recited several remarkable instances of telepathic communication in her personal experiences to show that the study of mind and soul is yet in its infancy, and that marvelous things are yet to be discovered in this little-explored and fascinating realm. She asserted that the solution of all the problems of disease and crime and social chaos with which we are today confronted is to be found only in understanding adequately the laws of thought and then governing all impulses and actions individual and social by scientific and thus right thinking. Mrs. Ballou then said that while such a state of society seemed almost too Utopian to hope for, she believed the day of its triumphant realization would come. She especially dwelt on the responsibilities of motherhood, saying that in the life of the individual, 'right generation' should take the place of 'regeneration.' The lecturer declared that each individual must bear the results of his own right or wrong thoughts and actions, and that he cannot lay this burden on another, and asserted that the theological dogma of the atonement had cursed and retarded civilization by teaching the manifest falsity that we can escape the inexorable consequences of our own actions. She closed with a beautiful peroration in the nature of an apostrophe to the souls who have left the burdens of this life for the joys of the immortal."

Meeting at Columbus, Ohio.

Since our last announcement went to press we are advised that the annual convention at Columbus, Ohio, May 22, 23 and 24, will be favored with the presence of Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A. Our state president, Hon. E. W. Bond, is at the present writing at Washington, attending a meeting of the trustees of the N. S. A.

It is probable that the Cleveland delegation will be accompanied by Dr. J. M. Temple, the well known California test medium, who is engaged this month by the East End Spiritual Society here. We hope to have present also that veteran pillar of the cause in Cleveland, Thomas Lees. Dr. H. C. Andrews, of Indiana, who has been working in this state for some time, advises us that he expects to attend.

Every active, earnest worker in the state who can possibly attend should do so without fail as the state officers for the coming year are to be elected and much business of vital importance to the cause needs serious consideration. Every one in the state who intends to go should notify the state secretary at once so that necessary arrangements for the entertainments of delegates may be provided. C. B. GOULD, Sec'y.

Mass-Meeting at Moravia, N. Y.

To the Editor:—The mass-meeting has just closed for this place. It was a fair success, and some good seed sown that will be likely to bring forth fruits of knowledge. Mrs. S. Comstock Ellis read a fine lecture loaded with good suggestions, emphasizing the value of high aims and loyal thinking, and the power of mind over body, and will over habit. Carrie Twing gave a happy rendering of the gospel in her unique style, and persuasive sympathy. Exquisite music did much for each session. Miss Elizabeth Babcock did most impressive execution, with a rare voice, full of spiritual sweetness, and Prof. Ditmar did fine work with the violin.

Here I am the guest of John and Mary Andrews. She is slowly rallying after a severe siege of la grippe. She was the first materializing medium that ever achieved an honest and widely extended success, and I doubt if she has ever had an equal. Her seances twenty and thirty years ago reached many thousands in all parts of the world, with evidence, both external and internal, that I have never seen equaled in the natural and spiritual completeness they presented. It was in her seance that I had the first vivid realization of the tangible presence of immortals clothed in all the outer symbolisms of life, and coupled with an order of intelligence indefinitely varied, and individually characteristic and certain; and all thrilled with a spiritual life and sweetness intensely real and exalting. Nowhere else have I realized so much. The memory of those experiences is a tonic and talisman to-day, amid the "confusion of tongues," and the shadowy character of so much that bewilders and depresses. The name of Mary Andrews will ever be an inspiration to hundreds who have been blessed by the ministrations of heaven through her mediumship.

Mrs. Twing goes to Syracuse from here to extend the work of the State Association, and next Thursday and Friday they hold a mass-meeting at Syracuse, N. Y. May success attend her efforts.

I go home from here, and to Titusville to speak, the 13th.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

MY LIFE'S WEB.

The threads of my life, all broken lay,
Or in many a tangled skein,
While in bitterness of heart I cried,
Filled with anguish and with pain.

I cannot go forward, the way is too dark,
I cannot gather again
The broken threads of my whole life work
And make it smooth and plain.

It folds me about, that tangled web,
It holds me down to earth,
It clings with a demon-like grip upon
The spirit that struggles for birth.

It holds in its hideous grasp those forms
That were dead long years agone:
Dead? Ah, no! They leer at me yet;
Will they nevermore begone?

Do I try to repent? They mock me with scorn,
They bid me. I turn and look,
To behold the faults I have given birth
As though written in a book.

They crowd upon me thick and fast,
Too dark for the sun to shine on,
These haunting mem'ries of the past;
Will they never-more begone?

I am weary, too weary to struggle on;
Too weary the future to face,
To gather the threads up one by one
Putting each in its proper place.

Did we weave life's web with bright love thoughts,
Deeds of kindness and words of cheer,
Instead of harsh words and cruel looks.
Ah! then we'd have nothing to fear.

HON. W. DEAN SHUART.

A Good Man Gone to Higher Life.

One of the most distinguished Spiritualists in New York State has passed to the higher life. The Hon. William Dean Shuart, ex-Surrogate of Monroe county, died at his residence in Rochester, Sunday Morning, April 22, at the age of 73 years. The deceased was born at Mendon, N. Y., and educated at the Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y. He was admitted to the bar in 1850 and practiced in Rochester. From 1862 to 1865 he was paymaster in the army, with the rank of major. In 1867, after a term as City Attorney, he was elected Surrogate of Monroe county, and being twice re-elected to the same office, gave sixteen years continuous service to the people in that very important and delicate position. Not only did learning and ability characterize his conduct of the office of Surrogate, but his kindness of heart and courteous bearing gave an atmosphere of serenity to his court most welcome to the widowed and orphaned.

Over forty years ago Judge Shuart entered into the study of the spiritual philosophy and manifestations. With R. D. Jones, a noted editor and Superintendent of Public Instruction at Rochester, and several other earnest students, he made a systematic inquiry into the physical manifestations of Spiritualism—he investigated the Fox sisters and found that there was a power beyond material things which produced the phenomena.

Once arriving at a positive knowledge of this, Judge Shuart was man enough to display the courage of his convictions. At that time it was a disgrace to be ranked among Spiritualists. So soon as the clergy, the scientists and literary people found out that the spiritual manifestations were due to occult power, and there was a danger of the people having direct communication with the spirit world instead of through orthodox channels, so soon did all the powers of church and state combine to kill Spiritualism. No abuse was too great, no calumnies too vehement, no falsehoods too colossal for the powers that were, to hurl at Spiritualists. And Judge Shuart, occupying a prominent position in his profession and in social circles, dared to stand up and declare that he believed in the doctrines of Spiritualism. He never flinched, but stood by what he considered God's truth. He was told by near and dear friends that unless he threw overboard his Spiritualism he would lose the confidence of the public. He replied by saying, "There is nothing higher nor holier than Truth, and I will never be ashamed of it!" Election time came around and the Judge's friends thought the public would desert him, but he was re-elected Surrogate again and again in the course of many years. This showed how the great sovereign people recognize true worth when it comes their way.

It is true that Judge Shuart's high abilities, his deep learning and charming personality might have won for him far higher honors in his profession or the public service, had he abandoned Spiritualism. But Judge Shuart, while being kind, sympathetic and courteous to all religious sectarians, would never yield one particle of his faith in the Spiritual philosophy, preferring to walk in the humble ranks of life, conscious of being in the right, than to obtain honors and wealth by pandering to that which he believed to be false. Few men have had to combat so much persistent abuse, ridicule and falsehood as Judge Shuart during the early period of the revival of Spiritualism, but he never lost his equanimity, was always kind, considerate of the feelings of others and earnest in his arguments in behalf of the higher life and nobler conceptions of death and immortality.

Judge Shuart may be said to have been a leader among the great thinkers of his time who have done so much to break down the barriers of orthodox theology and open up the way through the dense jungles of Churchianity and creedism to the Elysian fields beyond, to have put out the fires of an unending hell and torn down the barricades erected by bigots to fence out the guardian spirits who minister to the needs of struggling humanity. It is a grand thought that he did not die before he was vindicated, before thousands of his old-time opponents had to acknowledge that he was right in his Spiritualism and that they had been wrong. He was the means of converting multitudes of people to a belief in immortality who had before been materialists.

He did not die before he saw the mighty bulwarks of creedism tumbling to ruins. On the day of his demise the Sunday papers were full of the death-knells of the Westminster Confession of Faith; indeed the Judge seems to have ascended to a higher life to the discordant murmurs of dying theology on the material side and seraphic music heard only by the spirit on that lovely Sunday morning when he fell asleep, on the other.

What may be termed the "hidden self" of Judge Shuart was all that is best in human character. Firm in his conviction of man's spiritual progression and that the star of hope grows more resplendent beyond the change called death, he nevertheless had no harsh thought towards those who had less hopeful views of life and immortality. He was the very soul of honor, and his warm heart beat for humanity and longed for the dawn of that day which should usher in the brotherhood of man. He may be said to have "worn the white flower of a blameless life." His advice was always sound, his admonitions couched in words of love, and the erring who sought his counsel were always strengthened to renewed efforts for betterment. His religious conceptions were of the highest and his creed is fitly illustrated by the words of the poet: "So live, that when thy summons comes to you to join the innumerable caravan that moves to the mysterious realms, where each shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death, then go not like the quarry slave at night, lashed to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Father Tom and the Pope,
Or a Night at the Vatican.
Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "putteen," and an Irish recipe for "convounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in afther that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he,

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

D. E. Knorr: Q. (1) What causes an old clock to strike and shake when it is not running?

(2) Is spirit photography a fact, and is it possible to make mental impressions by exposing a plate in a dark room and gazing through the lens?

A. (1) That good Methodist minister and father in Spiritualism, Samuel Watson, wrote two books on his experiences, "The Clock Struck One," and "The Clock Struck Three," the long observed fact of old worn-out clocks striking warnings, suggesting to him these titles. So many instances have been recorded, and the striking always being connected with coming events of which it evidently was a warning, the only plausible explanation is that of the interposition of spiritual beings.

(2) There are instances of spirit photography that seem to be well-authenticated, but it must be confessed, by those who understand the art, that the chances for fraud are so many and various, that it is almost useless for those unacquainted with the practical details, to attempt to make the conditions proof against deception. That a spirit although invisible to the rays of light, may become visible to the actinic rays which make the picture, is not at all improbable.

(2) The photographing of thought at present is no more than a sensational item of unscrupulous press reports, and very little has been done that has trustworthiness or value. There is nothing in the way of thought photography, providing the films are made of substance as susceptible to the thought waves, as to light. In a degree this is true of all the more sensitive films.

The process of photographing a thought is entirely distinct and different from that of fixing the image of a spirit. The latter is an object, in its way, as well defined as anything exposed to the object glass of the camera; the former is a series of vibrations. These thought vibrations may carry with them those of chemical change and thus affect the plate, but as thought of itself has no actinic power it is impossible for it to impress itself. It must therefore be supposed that it is accompanied with some force like that of the chemical or X-rays.

"Bonner:" Q. I am interested in horse-racing, and also in Spiritualism through the mediumship of my wife, who has given me the past year hundreds of predictions which the winning horses would be, and always correctly. But whenever I have attempted to use this information in the betting ring, all kinds of obstructions have met me, even to sudden sickness, caused by spirits opposed. How can I overcome their influence?

A. You ought not to overcome the influence of these good and guardian spirits. Rather you should prayerfully desire their presence, and be grateful for their guidance.

Betting where the chances are even, and the result unknown may not be desirable, but it is not criminal. Where the bet is made with a sure knowledge of the result, it is a crime almost the equal of robbery. No good and trustworthy spirit would impart information which would give advantage of one over another.

Had this correspondent been able to make his wagers, according to the prophecies, might have won at first, but he would have been rudely brought to his senses by overwhelming losses. He should be grateful that a less severe course of correction was taken by his spirit friends.

Elisha D. Blakeman: Q. St. John says that Christ was the Son of God, "by whom the world was made," and again it is said of his followers, "and the works he did, the same shall they do also and greater," then must not the conclusion be that they can make worlds even greater than Christ has made?

A. Accepting the text the conclusion must follow, but why does our friend revert to this old threshed straw? He once was a church-member, he outgrew the creeds and became a Spiritualist; will he have us think that he yet has a lingering superstition, which he would allay by explanations? Let him recall the passage about faith, which if as large as a grain of mustard seed, could tumble mountains into the sea. He might ask how much faith, which is intangible, would make a body the size of a mustard seed? and if this tremendous assertion has ever been proven?

Reasoning in the other direction, as none of his followers have been able to set up a world factory, and as he declared they would be able if his followers, then there is not, nor has there been a single follower of Christ.

John Morrisey: Q. Are the stars inhabited by disembodied spirits, or is the spirit world beyond the stars?

A. It is presumable judging from the correspondence which prevails in all nature that the stars are suns like our own, each having a planetary system. The inhabitants of each of these, if inhabited, would correspond to the conditions which prevail in each separate orb. The spirit world is not on any of these physical orbs, but on zones surrounding them, as given in detail in the work entitled "Philosophy of spirit and the Spirit World."

Q. What is the distance of the nearest star?

A. The distance is so vast and the difficulties in the way of observation so great, that only an approximate estimate can be given. The nearest are so remote that light traveling at the rate of 192,000 miles in a second is 32 years in traversing the incomprehensible space.

Q. How are poor people, unable to pay profession mediums, to gain proofs of spirit communion?

A. No one has a patent on mediumship. The home circle is free for all, and is by far the best means of investigation and satisfactory communication.

A. P. Smith: Q. When and where did Thomas Francis Meagher meet his death and under what conditions?

A. This Irish patriot, transported for life to Tasmania, escaped in 1852; came to this country, and in 1861 entered the United States army as captain, and became brigadier general. In 1865 he filled the office of secretary of Montana, and in 1867, July 1, fell from a steamer at Fort Benton and was drowned.

A highly sensational story was recently published in the New York journals, of a petrified body being found on the banks of the river below that Fort, which was recognized as being that of the noted Irish leader. It is said that the body bore marks of his having been shot by Indians after he had reached the shore. The story is scarcely credible.

O. H. Long: Q. By what process are messages transmitted and received over the Atlantic cable?

A. The earth-currents interfere with a long cable, and it is found impossible to send messages over one by the methods of ordinary telegraphy. Instead of a sounder, a ray of light is used, and this is moved to the right or left, by magnetic attraction produced by the current, which is of greater volume than intensity. The receiving operator sets in a darkened room, and reads the message as indicated by the swinging finger of light.

J. A. Richardson: Q. Is there any history dating back to the supposed time of Adam?

If the correspondent means a history relative to Adam and the account of the creation as given in Genesis, there is absolutely none outside of that book. If he means a history having no reference to Adam, as to the age of ancient nations, that of Egypt, Assyria and Hindostan reach beyond the age of the mythic Adam.

Constant effort has been made by those who have investigated the antiquity of nations—who have unfortunately have with rare exceptions been of the priestly caste—to force all dates to the received chronology manufactured for the Bible. Those who have arrived at opposing conclusions, have been decried as ignorant pretenders.

Renouf, in "Religion of Ancient Egypt," says: "The earliest monuments which have been discovered, present to us the same fully developed civilization and the same religion as the later monuments. The gods whose names appear in the oldest tombs were worshiped down to the Christian time. The same kind of priesthoods which are mentioned in the tablets of Canopus and Rosetta in the Ptolemaic period are as ancient as the pyramids and more ancient than any pyramid of which we know the date."

The age of the pyramids is indeterminable, but at the Biblical date of the creation, a grand civilization with its colossal temples and its pyramids flourished on the banks of the Nile.

Mrs. M. E. Loomis: Q. I read that in the Egyptian city of Thebes, there are blocks of stone 90 feet long, 18 feet wide and 18 feet thick, and there are columns, 75 feet high and 23 feet in circumference, on top of which was an entablature of equally enormous stones. How was it possible to get these titanic blocks into position?

A. The representations on the walls of the temples show that these massive blocks were drawn after being mounted on rollers, to their places by thousands of men pulling directly on ropes. To elevate them the inclined plane was employed. The earth was piled up along the face of the masonry constantly to the height it had reached, in a gentle incline, up which the blocks were drawn. After the completion of the structure this earth was removed.

Whatever Is Is All Right.

To the Editor:—Will you kindly permit me to answer through your paper, our worthy brother, editor of Harbinger of Light? He has assailed my pet hobby, regarding his opinion of "Whatever is is right."

We might just as well deny the possible future existence of the giant oak when we behold the tiny acorn seed, as to deny the truth contained in the phrase, "Whatever is is right."

Truth, like the rays of the sun,
May be used, but owned by none!

"Whatever is is right" is a clear-cut fact—no doctrine whatever! A principle may be pure, but its practice very poor. No reason to condemn the principle. I would call it a theory rather than a doctrine.

I have the book written by Child, and I see he calls it a doctrine. Mr. Child says: "Both the obstacles that lie in our pathway, must be right if both exist." Evil is only the undeveloped state of what we term good.

Should a man be blamed for being an infant once?

Development of growth, of age, brings him to manhood.

Should the undeveloped state of good be spurned because time enough has not elapsed for the so-called evil to become a good?

The highest forms of perfection are but the final result of the lowest forms of evil and vice-versa.

No one advocates that it is right to do wrong!

It is an imperative fact that while our planet and people have not reached perfection, we must have good and evil, or the undeveloped as well as the highly developed stages of right and wrong. Good or evil, as you choose to term them. Thus proving (to my mind) whatever is, to be absolutely right according to its stage of development!

I am some surprised to read of our veteran writer, Dr. Peebles, saying "that the promulgation of this doctrine is demoralizing, and its attempted attachment to Spiritualism calculated to increase prejudice against us." The world is ready for such a truth! (I call it.)

Why not? Are not men and women using their reason and thought force as never before? Is this thought greater than our scientific discoveries? To deny the simple phrase "Whatever is is right," or "Whatever is to be, will be!" Is to affirm that the Supreme Cause of all that is or ever will be—is an error! Can we look above us and call all a lie? No one can or does! Because what may be right for one and wrong for another, does not make it wrong for the first case! Only to those who can sense good from evil, and desire to do right instead of wrong, can the light of this pure truth shine in reason and keep us responsible beings.

If we obey nature's laws truly, we will not so greatly err. "Whatever is, is right," and "Whatever is to be, will be!" JOSEPHINE E. STEVENS.

A CARD.

The principals of Belvidere Seminary would respectfully inform their friends and the public generally that this institution will be open during the summer and early autumn for the accommodation of children and adults who seek freedom from business cares or the excitement of social and fashionable life. Its location is healthy and beautiful, its grounds ample and well shaded, drainage and water excellent.

Belvidere, as its name indicates, is a beautiful inland town, in Northern New Jersey, 700 feet above the sea, and surrounded on all sides by forest-covered hills, at the base of which flow the Pequest and Delaware rivers, along whose banks are many places of special interest to artists and all lovers of the picturesque in nature.

Its streets are well shaded and lighted with electricity. In its near vicinity are well cultivated farms, from which a fresh supply of milk, eggs, butter, fresh fruits and vegetables can be had daily. It is only twelve miles from Easton, Pa., and ten miles from the Delaware Water Gap. It is easy of access from New York and Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania and Delaware, Lackawanna & Western railroads, with six trains running daily each way. Its walks and drives are exceptionally fine, presenting an ever pleasing variety of river and mountain scenery. Here is just the place for the weary to find repose and the recreation that invigorates without fatiguing. For further particulars, address A. C. BUSH,
Belvidere, Warren Co., N. J.

RATHER CRITICAL.

Journeys through the Milky Way.

The papers in successive issues of The Progressive Thinker, giving the experience of Franz Petersilea in spirit land, have been read with interest, if not with entire assent. Some of the most astounding facts are related in such an easy-going, matter-of-course way that one gets the impression that an interim with Jesus Christ, or a trip to the Milky Way is an easy, almost inconsequential thing to the freed human spirit. Take the following from letter number eight:

"On the earth you travel from one town to another, you travel from one ocean to another, you travel from one country to another, you travel around the globe and so forth. We travel from one place to another. We travel from one sphere to another. We travel from one planet to another, and sometimes we take a turn through the zone of the milky way, as it is called on earth, but, in reality, it is another vast zone of innumerable worlds."

Taking "a turn through the milky way," now and then—"sometimes," as Spirit Petersilea puts it, is, no doubt, a very pleasant pastime, seemingly, no more worthy of note among spirits than would be a turn about one's pasture among farmers on earth. Still, it may be well for us to think what the words imply to the reader who knows something about the rudiments of astronomy and stops to recall a few of its figures.

According to the latest calculations of Newcomb and Michelson the velocity of light is a little more than 186,000 miles per second. The distance which light travels in a year at this rate is called a light year. This distance is about sixty-three thousand times the mean distance of the earth from the sun, say, 5,800,000,000,000 miles. For convenience in expressing the enormous distances to what are commonly known as the "fixed stars," astronomers use the term "light year." For instance: Polarus, the Pole Star, 44.7 light years; Auregae, 70.9 light years; Groombridge, 98.9 light years. This means that it takes light 44.7 years to travel through the space between Polaris and the earth; 70.9 years to reach us from Auregae; and nearly one hundred years to reach us from far-off Groombridge.

Beyond these and a few other stars whose distances have been approximately determined by astronomers, stretches the stellar universe with its nearly one hundred million stars visible in the great Lick telescope, and yet so remote that, as Prof. Young tells us in his standard work, General Astronomy, light is "from ten thousand to twenty thousand years in traversing the intervening space."

Sir J. Herschel describes the milky way as "a zone encircling the whole sphere of the heavens," consisting of "stars scattered by millions, like glittering dust." It contains also a large number of star clusters, with a few true nebulae. In some places the stars are too thickly packed for counting, especially in the bright knots which abound here and there. Yet the stars which seem so near to one another, are known to be millions upon millions of miles apart.

With these recognized, general facts of astronomy in mind, let us make a desperate mental effort to accompany the freed spirit on one or more of the journeys of which Spirit Petersilea speaks. Suppose that a band of spirits, weary of earth's discords, of the guardianship of stupid mortals, wishes to take an outing for pleasure or for study. Starting from the earth and moving with the speed of light, 186,000 miles per second, nearly forty-five years would be required to reach Polaris, over seventy to reach Auregae, nearly one hundred to reach Groombridge, and from 10,000 to 20,000 years to reach the more distant regions of the stellar universe; and yet, our band of spirits has not crossed the hither boundary of the milky way, to say nothing of "taking a turn" through it.

Let us try again; light is too slow! Give our spirit band the power to pass forty times around the earth in a single second, one million miles per second. Start it at the birth of Christ, let it speed on, night and day, through all the intervening years, pausing not one moment, it would to-day be within the confines of the stellar universe of which our own sun is a part. It has only begun the journey to the milky way!

I do not say that Spirit Petersilea is not right, and, though, in the light of modern astronomy and of what we know of man's snail-like movements on earth, his statement seems like vain boasting. I am in no position to dispute what he says. I well know what claims are made as to the annihilation of both time and space by man's spirit, but this journeying through the heavens at a velocity which outspeeds light and lightning, which enables spirits to make morning calls on neighbors in the milky way, is so stupendous a fact that I cannot grasp ...

And, yet, such power would seem necessary if we are to survey those far-off realms which modern instruments bring into view, and, perhaps, grander realms still undiscovered. Each of the one hundred million stars seen through our largest telescopes, is believed to be a sun, the center of a solar system similar to our own. To visit and make but the most general survey of one of these systems would certainly require a year, as we measure time; to visit all, even in this hasty manner, would require one hundred million years, and still our work would be but just begun. All this and more may be true. What power, what dignity does it confer on the human spirit! I, the man in the flesh, so full of doubt, must wait a little time, then, mayhap, I shall know.

Emma Rood Tuttle—Her New Volume of Poems.

Since the publication of "From Soul to Soul," by Emma Rood Tuttle, there has been constant inquiry for another volume of her poems which was promised. When the prospectus of that volume was issued, requesting the names of those who wished to subscribe, nearly 1,000 were at once received and three editions have been called for. This plan proved so satisfactory that this new volume will be issued in the same manner. By it the cost of publication is guaranteed, and at the same time to those desiring the book it is furnished at much less cost.

The new volume will be in the same style as "From Soul to Soul," will contain over 300 pages, beautifully bound, with embossed cover, will contain engraved portrait of the author, and subscribers copies will have her autograph.

Emma Rood Tuttle is well known to the readers of The Progressive Thinker and the spiritual-press by the many poems she has contributed, and her spiritual songs. The present volume will contain the best of these, and many not before published. The price will be $1; to subscribers, 75 cents. It will be published as soon as the number of subscribers warrant.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. DEATH DEFEATED,

—OR—

The Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young,

BY J. M. PEEBLES, M. D., M. A., Ph. D.

It certainly is just what is needed as a book of good suggestions and instructions along the line of health. He treats the subject in his own matter-of-fact style. The book comprises a practical subject handled in a practical manner by a practical man. Even if people do not wish or expect to live here always, they should know how to live right and enjoy the life that belongs to them. This is undoubtedly the most useful book for the masses the Doctor has ever published, for it strikes at the root or cause of disease, and tells how to avoid it. 212 pages, cloth bound. Price, $1. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, And All Being.

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

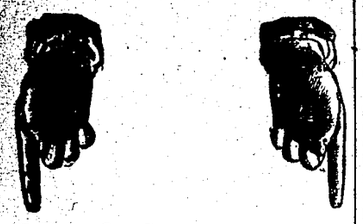
"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secereta ry.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.



"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

TRUTH

The only way to find out who is the "Greatest Psychic Physician living" is to read what their patients say.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

never claims that he is the greatest physician living, or that he is the

GREATEST PSYCHIC.

He believes that there are hundreds of healers who are just as successful as he is, and he never yet has claimed that he is or was the best psychic, although twenty years before the public as the independent slate-writer with the record of not one person who ever accused him of fraud, ought to make the public THINK when they compare his claims to other so-called psychics.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

only desires those who are sick to remember that for over twenty years he has been before the public as a psychic, and over twelve years as a physician, and he never claims greater powers than others; but we believe he has a right to think he has as great gifts as those who claim so much.

Kindly read the following

BOOK REVIEWS.

A Visit to a Gnani. From Adams Peak to Elephanta. By Edward Carpenter. Chicago: Alice B. Stockham & Co. $1.00

A vivid pen picture of oriental thought and teaching, containing in a few pages what one often fails to find by searching many volumes.

A Gnani is one who knows, a Knower; in other words, one who has the consciousness of the greater or universal life which Carpenter calls the Kosmic Consciousness. It is the higher self or ego of the Theosophists, the Infinite I of Fichte, the Noumena of Kant, the divine mind of Christian Science, the Kingdom of heaven of Christ.

A Visit to a Gnani will be read with interest by all students of Life, but especially by those investigating Oriental philosophy.

Our Bible, and the Higher Criticism. By Moses Hull.

A new book by Moses Hull is an event in the Spiritualistic world. Whatever book he puts forth will be found useful and pertinent to its design. Few indeed are they—if any such there be—who have a more clear, correct and comprehensive as well as minute knowledge of the Bible and whatever pertains therto. Therefore it is no unnoticeable event when he undertakes to set forth the principles and methods of "the higher criticism" and applies those principles in the consideration of the series of books, tracts, or pamphlets which constitute the Bible.

Comparatively few people have a clear idea of the higher criticism—what it means. Says Mr. Hull: "The term 'Higher Criticism' means strictly Inside Criticism; or a criticism of the Bible from an examination of its contents."

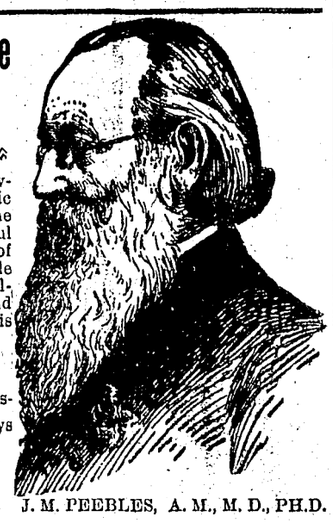
Says Rev. Washington Gladden, as quoted by Mr. Hull: "It is the attempt to learn from the Scriptures themselves the truth about their origin. It consists in a careful study of the books, of the manners and customs referred to in them, of the historical facts mentioned by them; it compares part with part, and book with book, to discover agreements, if they exist, and discrepancies, that they may be reconciled."

Again, Mr. Hull says: "The Higher Criticism puts all sacred books in the same crucible and kindles the same fire under each of them." The same searching, unbiased, impartial investigation is applied to each—the Bible is given no preference or leniency because of any supposed or claimed sacred character above other books.

In the spirit of the higher criticism as thus defined, Mr. Hull subjects the Bible, book by book, to a fearless, critical analysis, comparing text with text and book with book, and pointing out errors and discrepancies, without fear or favor.

The Spiritualistic character of the Bible, the mediumistic character of the prophets, and the fallible character of both, are clearly shown. The author sustains and strengthens his position by frequent citations from other competent writers, thus giving added value to the volume.

The investigator in biblical lore will find Mr. Hull's book a valuable repertory of up-to-date knowledge concerning the Bible, its nature, its teachings, and the place it should rightfully occupy among the "sacred" books of the world.



Death Defeated; or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young. By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A., Ph. D.

Readers of this new book by the widely known author, lecturer and traveler, will find it partakes of his eminent characteristics as a writer, setting forth his ideas with clearness, pressing his points with pungent plainness, piling up demonstrative facts of logic and experience, appealing to the common sense and best judgment of all.

He presents strong arguments to show that man is not normally a carnivorous animal, and that flesh-eating is a cause of disease, and other evils, such as aggressive warlike instincts and acts and brutal selfishness. The reader will find the book replete with wise information, and though he should not be able to defeat death and gain earthly immortality, he will learn many useful things by which health will be conserved and, at least, longer life attained. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Cloth, price $1.00.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free.]

On Sunday, May 6, the remains of Mrs. George Kerchener, of Rutland, Barry county, Mich, were followed to the grave. The deceased was an exemplary wife and mother and was much beloved. The husband and two children and also her parents and a brother are left to mourn her departure. But all are Spiritualists, the father, Mr. J. Brown, being a veteran medium, and thus they are consoled in the sublime knowledge, "There is no death."

The address was by Geo. B. Holmes, of Grand Rapids, and the rites of the order of which the deceased was a member were performed at the burial.
Grand Rapids, Mich. H.

On the second of April last, Mrs. Louisa Bradley, who had journeyed in this world upwards of three score and ten years, passed to the higher life from the family home in Buffalo, N. Y. Mrs. Bradley was converted to Spiritualism nearly half a century ago. The oldest daughter developed a wonderful phase of mediumship, and through her organism the loved ones have come to the Bradley home, ministering in hours of sorrow, and giving strength when all other sources failed.

It was my privilege to visit our arisen sister a few weeks before her transition. It seemed as though the hour was too brief for her to relate the blessed experiences that had come to her in the name of Spiritualism. Although her sphere had been confined to the home during her life, she was interested in all that pertained to our cause; she was a woman of broad ideas and tolerant of the opinions of others. The granddaughter holds the office of leader in the lyceum and a little grandson has been connected with the lyceum ever since Mr. Hull and myself have been in charge of the work here. Thus the fruit of this noble woman is seen among us.

According to the request of the subject of this notice, funeral services were held in the Spiritual Temple. She arranged for the funeral as one would be expected to do, who was going on a pleasant journey. There was no sign of mourning in the Temple, nor about the members of the family. There were no piteous groans, nor bitter weeping; the appearance of that family of Spiritualists, the discourse, in fact, everything connected with the services was a glorious object lesson to the outside world. The family looked for the last time on the face of the dear one in the home, the remains were carried into the Temple, but were not exposed to the view of the public. The casket was buried under a wealth of flowers contributed largely by the First Spiritual Church and its different auxiliaries. The daughters felt as they returned to the home after the body had been interred, there will hereafter be a vacant chair, but our mother will come to us in spirit, and we can congratulate her that she has been released from physical suffering, and met face to face the dear sons who preceded her a little while before.

TWO IN ONE,

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

ASTRAL WORSHIP.

By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knopp.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contributions which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

THE ABIDING THINGS.

Glowing Words from a Progressive Elder.

He Concedes the Possibility of Balaam Making an Ass of Himself, but Does Not Think the Ass Could Make a Man of Himself!

"And now abideth these three, faith, hope and charity: but the greatest of these is charity."

So wrote Paul in a masterly summing up of the great realities of human life. Just before he had said: "When I became a man I put away childish things." As a man discards the toys by which childhood is beguiled, so he gave up long cherished beliefs and relinquished many superstitions which mature age had enabled him to perceive were useless and degrading.

To my mind there is no more pathetic moment in the recorded history of man than this. Grounded in the faith of his childhood, buttressed by race prejudice, spurred on by Pharasaic pride, he comes to a sudden stand-still. Elsewhere he speaks of his experience as a "loss." Swift as the destructive cyclone came a spiritual illumination, a mental enlargement, and in a moment "old things passed away." His Jewish idea of God, the sacredness of the vast Temple, the profound and solemn import of the sacrifices, the absurd valuation of his punctilious observance of the ritualistic ceremonies of the Pharisees—all these were now gone. Apparently all was "lost." As a man stands in a room and gazes contemptuously at the broken toys and soiled playthings of childhood, so he now regards the overthrown idols of his earliest faith and hope. We may pardon him the tears which, though unmentioned, he no doubt shed in that moment of renunciation which, to a man of less heroic mould and mighty heart, would have been a monument of despair. We may picture to ourselves the look of pain on the face, and feel in our hearts "the aching void" that troubled for a moment that great soul as he gave up the symbols and precepts of the ancient and honorable faith of his fathers. Poor and passionless must be the heart that cannot see both the pathos and heroism of this man's life. A shallow soul, unable to comprehend a devotion and intensity such as swayed Paul's nature, can look unmoved upon the tragedy of a dying faith, and even smile as the cherished ideals of the soul of another are broken and destroyed. But the truly great in heart and mind will stand at the field of Paul's experience and gaze upon it as upon some historic battle-place, forever to be had in memory as a scene of devotion and deliverance.

We, too—we that have "lost" even while acknowledging "gain"—we know Paul. We have been with him. We understand the sacrifice, the tender memory, the moistened eyes, the almost overpowering desire at times for the "old order," the feeling of emptiness that sometimes troubles, although we know that "loss is gain." Yes, we know.

I do not ask sympathy. Those who have given up their "childish things" understand me, and those who are otherwise could not give sympathy. But we may state a few things by way of illustration.

I once believed in a personal God, a real Person, a Father, who loved me. I thought he knew me individually and listened when I talked to him, and delighted to help me. Now, as Drummond forewarns in the preface of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, I have substituted "a reign of law for a personal God." Infinite Intelligence manifested through the universe in law and order has taken the place in my thought of an anthropomorphic God, a Father who was seated somewhere to listen to my plaints and praise. I feel that I have gained, and yet there is a "loss." If in my mind I would smile at the old conception, when the memory of a prayer at the bed-side steals into "memory's panoramic view," my smile is closely crowded by a tear. A Father in the heavens! If, after all, brother, there is a Father, far away and unknown though he may be; who, spite of our doubts and unbelief, pitying our blindness loves us still; if such there is who so cold and passionless as to be unmoved by the thought.

So also we once leaned upon a Vicarious Savior. He bore our sins, loved us, died to save us. We sang, tenderly to sweet music and with swelling hearts:

"Jesus, I love thee; thou art to me, Dearer than ever mortal can be."

Somehow we trusted him. When we were heavy laden with sin we "cast our burden upon him" and were rested. And as Ingersoll said in the closing paragraph of his last lecture, published in The Progressive Thinker, if this story of Jesus and his Father was only true it would be the grandest and sublimest thing ever spoken to man. Of all the myths and legends, splendid hopes and rose-colored expectations which have been born of man's needs, and nurtured by his desires, there is nothing to compare to the majestic panorama of Jesus in life and death. As Renan says:

"His worship will grow young without ceasing. His legend will call forth tears from the eyes of millions yet unborn. The story of his sufferings will melt the stoniest hearts. All ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born greater than Jesus."

But we have given up the old idea of Jesus as a vicarious sacrifice for sins. We still revere his life, love his spirit, and teach his beautiful truths, but the magical qualities once ascribed to his blood are held no more as a truth by us. We have "put away childish things."

Here is "gain," but also "loss." Do not laugh at us if sometime a snatch of sacred song arouses for a moment a sense of the old "trust in Jesus," or if in the congregation we somewhere feel the weakness of human nature and the awful need of a Savior. And do not expect us to bear with equanimity the coarse slurs at Jesus indulged in by the unthinking. If Jesus is only a myth, still he is beautiful as such, and being sacred to many hearts should be spoken of with due respect to other's feelings and conceptions.

In like manner the Bible. As I write one lies just before me. What a book we once thought it. The Word of God! A personal God wrote it, or had it done. Everything in it was divinely inspired. It was an infallible book and it was to govern our consciences. We believed it implicitly, all of it. Jonah and the whale, Baalam and the ass, Elisha making iron swim on water, Samson and the wonderful jaw-bone, and everything else. Higher criticism has not yet shattered our faith in any of the events there recorded. We did not try to explain by allegories or figures of speech. We simply took it literally, as a literal narrative of so many historical facts. But all that is past. We have eliminated the marvelous elements. We accept only that part which seems reasonable. We do not believe a thing to have happened then which we know cannot happen now. We do not delude our minds with the idea that iron would swim in Jordan but will sink in Grand River. While we concede the possibility of Baalam making an ass of himself, we do not think the ass could have made a man of himself.

No: the old idea of the Bible is gone. And yet, the Bible is here. We love it yet. We can even laugh over its extravagant stories. Now that we do not consider it infallible, we can read its stories as allegories, myths, old literature, and not only enjoy but be benefited in so doing.

And after all, where can we find so many good maxims, so many wise injunctions, so many pure precepts, published together? Reject everything unreasonable; as sensible people, assign all the "big" stories to the department of fable and fiction, yet there still remains the grandest single collection of ethical teaching ever compiled and published in one volume. To follow the teaching of Jesus is to be good, is to realize a perfection of character not taught so concisely in any other of earth's publications.

So while we say as did Paul, "I put away childish things," we also add his confident conclusion: "And now remaineth faith, hope and love, these three, and the greatest of these is love." Yes, these remain. They abide forever. They are the essence of the teaching of Jesus. They are the fundamental elements of true religion. Criticism may destroy the fables, expunge the myths, relegate the marvels to the moles and bats, but the essentials will abide. Faith in the unalterable operations of law, hope for all humanity, and love as the regenerating force of life, these can never be destroyed. Belief in the Vicarious Savior yields to a rational acceptance of Jesus as a great teacher of Truth and Good. Belief in a Personal God is displaced by a profound satisfaction in the knowledge that fixed and unalterable law, while not allowing any miracles, "special providences," to occur, yet preserves us with all of a "Father's" care and insures the continuity and stability of all things. Reverence for the Bible, which held it to be an infallible book, every word inspired of God and true as literal history, is supplanted by a conservative view which finds in its store of ethical wisdom the most concise and helpful guide to right living yet compiled.

Here are the "childish things" put away, and here are the "abiding things." As men of sense we propose now to discard childish things, but we do not propose to leave one extreme to fly to another. To my mind the blind credulity which accepts the whole Bible as literal history is more tolerable than the frantic rage of those who spit at religion and snap and snarl at every indication of a belief in God.

"Prove all things," but do not indiscriminately reject all things. "Hold fast to that which is good," do not foolishly cut loose from everything. It may be unfortunate to be a "child," but it is worse to be a fool.

ELD. H. W. B. MYRICK.

A LITTLE SERMON.

What this troubled old world needs
Is less of quibbling over creeds,
Fewer words and better deeds.

Less of "Thus and so shall you Think and act, and say and do."
More of "How may I be true?"

Less of wrangling over text;
Less of creed and code perplexed;
More of charity unvexed.

Less of shouting: "I alone
Have a right to hurl the stone."
More of heart that will condone.

Less of ruling: "Hear! You must Hold this tenet, wrong or just."
More of patient, helpful trust.

Less of microscopic scan
Of the faults of fellow man.
More of brave, uplifting plan.

Less of dogma, less pretense.
More belief that Providence
Will sanctify our common sense.

More of chord of kindness blent
O'er the discords of dissent.
Then will come the great content.

"Just to be good and to do good."
Simple, plain, for him who would
A creed that may be understood.

OUR GUINEA HENS.

A Little Sermon for Everybody.

Some of you have no doubt heard the story of the wealthy philanthropist, who, on finding a widow in poverty and distress, endeavored to make her happy. He purchased a plot of ground, built a house, furnished it, supplied her with a year's provisions, and money for contingent expenses, doing all in accordance with her wishes; gave her the deed to the property, and went away.

At the end of a year he returned, and inquired concerning the success of his philanthropic venture. Did she like her location? Oh, yes.

Did the house suit her? Splendidly.

Did she have provisions enough for the year? Oh, yes; more than enough.

Did she have enough money? Oh, yes, had not spent near all of it.

Then you must have been quite happy? Well—y-e-s, tolerably so.

Why, what has been lacking, that you should not have been perfectly happy?

Well, to tell the truth, my neighbor here has a guinea hen, and the pesky thing is squawking so much that it has tormented the life out of me all summer.

In traveling with a friend one summer I found something in almost every act of his to criticise, and find fault with; but kept it to myself; admitting that it destroyed a great part of the pleasure of the trip. Later, in considering the matter, something said, "that was your guinea hen."

In canvassing, some years ago; I frequently met with so much ignorance, and non-appreciation of my wares, saw so many people whose lives were merely existence, apparently no aspirations for a higher life; simply content to plod along in the old rut made by the feet of their fore-fathers, that I used to think that, if reincarnation was true, it would be a grand thing for such people; and I would often make myself miserable by giving away to thoughts of condemnation of such people. Another guinea hen.

Attending a Spiritualist meeting some years ago; I listened to a discourse so strongly flavored with orthodoxy, that it aroused all the indignation within me, I allowing my thought full sway, with the result that I went home with a violent headache, which was so much in evidence the next morning, that I called on a magnetic healer for treatment. I received the comforting assurance that I had been noticed by the healer, the evening before, and my mental condition recognized and the result foreseen. And that I was suffering the consequences of my own violation of nature's law, and she hoped it would teach me a lesson. It did. It was only a guinea hen.

I used to enjoy hunting, and the report of a gun would interest me at once, bringing to mind pleasant memories of former incidents.

Now, because a Methodist minister chooses to spend his small change for ammunition, instead of sending Bibles to the heathen; and his idle time in shooting at a target, instead of reading his Bible, the report of his rifle has grated on my nerves somewhat. Guinea hen.

When I see so much discussion in our noble paper, The Progressive Thinker, over the declaration made at the Chicago convention, one affirming the God-idea, the other negating it, and various other sharp criticisms, tending to discord, rather than harmony, which is so essential to the upbuilding of the true and higher philosophy, I think of the guinea hens. Suppose we put on the other fellow's spectacles, and stand before a mental mirror, as it were, and take a retrospective view of self, from the other fellow's standpoint. Don't you think we would find a large flock of guinea hens?

While we may have risen to a plane of higher vibration; and that which was formerly attractive to us, is now repulsive; we must not forget the fact that others are still on the plane we have left; and that others whose ideas now seem ridiculous to us, may when we reach the same plane of vibration, be found to contain truth. Let us pull the beam out of our own eye, that we may see more clearly to pick the mote out of our brother's eye.

And when his, or her ideas are repulsive to us; let us think of the guinea hens, and exercise love, and kindness, which belong to a recognition of the universal brotherhood of humanity. DR. CARLOS WRIGHT.

Cordingley Kindly Criticized.

To the Editor:—In your issue of May 19, is advertised, under the head of "Illinois Camp-meeting," the opening date of the Illinois State Spiritual Camp-meeting, over the signatures of G. V. Cordingley, president, and H. W. Miller, (his private secretary) secretary.

Now, a State Spiritualist Camp-meeting, or any camp-meeting to wear that name should be an organization of representative Spiritualists of the State. Mr. Cordingley, or anyone else having sufficient funds, has a perfect right to establish a private camp-meeting or annual picnic, if he chooses, but to advertise it as "The State Spiritualist Camp-meeting," is not the proper thing to do.

The writer hereof has the larger, the higher interest of Spiritualism inborn and inbred, and hails with delight all movements calculated to advance that cause, but such misleading headlines should be withheld from print in the Spiritualistic press.

Mr. Cordingley has held an annual picnic on the banks of the beautiful Deep Lake several years, and those who have camped in the grand old woods have no doubt received some benefit from the rest and recuperation, but he should give his camp the name of Deep Lake Camp, or some other appropriate name and only advertise such speakers and mediums as he is sure of. This matter of flying under false colors is doing him no good, his meetings no good, and Spiritualism an injury.

These lines are written in perfect kindness toward Mr. Cordingley and all who are to be his helpers in this undertaking, but with a still deeper interest in genuine Spiritualism. A FRIEND.

HUMANITARIAN AND ANGELIC WORK.

It Is the Kind of Work Which Counts in the Final and Spiritual Summing Up.

TELLS OF FELONS SAVED—MRS. MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH LECTURES AT THE AUDITORIUM—DESCRIBES WORK OF HOPE HALL, TO WHICH 200 EX-CONVICTS OWE OPPORTUNITY FOR BEGINNING ANEW HONEST LIVES—MOST OF THEM KNOWN TO BE KEEPING THEIR GOOD RESOLUTIONS—A LARGE AUDIENCE COMPOSED IN PART OF METHODIST DELEGATES HEARS HER.

Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth, the "Little Mother" of 8,000 men who are serving or have served penitentiary sentences, stood before a great audience in the Auditorium lately and pleaded for justice for the criminal. Mrs. Booth was introduced by President Henry Wade Rogers of Northwestern University. She was garbed as an officer in the Volunteers of America. She spoke rapidly of the history of the prison reform and its results to an audience, composed largely of ministers and laymen who are delegates to the General Conference of the Methodist church. Her address was one of a series given in connection with the sessions of the conference.

Hope Hall in Chicago and its work during the year of its existence had a place among the results which were described. Two hundred men released from Joliet have passed through the Chicago home, Mrs. Booth stated. They have been taken from the prison in which they had served their sentences and brought to Chicago. They have passed a period at the hall and have been placed where they were able to lead honest lives if they desired. They have been given the opportunity which the man who has served a sentence and comes from prison with the marks upon him does not have.

FEW GO BACK TO CRIMINAL LIVES.

Of these 200 men Mrs. Booth stated that more than 75 percent had realized the hope that they could be reclaimed. Such a proportion she said she knew personally had not gone back into a criminal life. The others had gone into other lands to make new lives for themselves, and there was no reason to believe that their course had been any less satisfactory than that of their comrades whose present condition was known.

The New York Hope Hall has received 800 men from Sing Sing and other prisons. A similar proportion of these men, Mrs. Booth affirmed, were living, honest, upright lives, and she asserted her belief that it was simply lack of knowledge of the whereabouts of the other men that prevented the known proportion from being larger. She related some of the difficulties which had been experienced in establishing the homes in New York. The first, she said, had been placed in the city as an experiment.

"We leased the property before the neighbors knew what we were. When suddenly they did come to a realization of our character they immediately took alarm. They did not raise a sensational cry against us, but they came quietly to us and said that they believed in the work and wished us all success, but they did not think the city was the proper place in which to attempt it. We needed a farm, they said. We replied that we were sorry, but that the property had been leased and it would be impossible to move. The experiment would have to succeed or fail there. It succeeded, and those people became our warm allies. When we decided it was best to move to a farm and were able to secure one we moved to Flushing. There an open opposition began and our neighbors complained that we should have staid in the city, where there was a police force to handle our men if there should be occasion for police restraint. We made the same reply that we had to stay where we were. The records of the police department have proven that there has been no increase in crime in the neighborhood.

NEEDS OF THE MAN IN PRISON.

Aside from her account of what had been accomplished for the man released from prison after his discharge, Mrs. Booth told of his needs while serving his sentence, and what the Volunteers' Prisoners' league had done to meet them. Some of the things she said were these:

"Any agency that can help them outside must begin inside.

"I believe in punishments; I believe in prisons; I believe in discipline; I do not believe in pampering the prisoner; but I do believe in fair play.

"When a man has been punished, imprisoned and disciplined, and then released he should be what the State says he is—a free man.

"The use of the words 'ex-convict' and 'ex-criminal' is unjust, unfair, and un-American. We use the word 'graduate.' It is fair and just. They are graduates from the hardest school of discipline and training.

"It is not preaching that these men want. It is loving.

"Ministers should go to a State prison and talk to the audience they would have there. It is refreshing to preach to men confessedly at fault.

"We have no right to take men and keep them so long that they never can be like other men, so that their walk and their look betray their imprisonment.

"It will be shown that there is a chance for the man who has been a State prisoner."

HOPE FOR EVERY CONVICT.

"I have come out of prison work far from disheartened. I know that in each heart there is a spot which can be touched. You cannot legislate for these men in the mass. You must deal with them individually. I have come back from prison work with my confidence in the possibility of renovating human nature strengthened.

"How is it that we have 84,000 criminals in this country? How is it that our police records show so many to have become habitual criminals? Think of the millions of dollars which have gone to the heathen in foreign lands. I would not take a dollar of it back, but I would say that a few thousands could be given to the men in our prisons. Many in our prisons to-day would not have been there if there had been one loving, sympathetic hand stretched out to save them. What right have we to say that these men cannot be saved? Prison wardens have said that 85 per cent of the men in the prisons cannot be anything else. They come out of the penitentiary swearing reform. They try it and fail. They go back to their prison and their message to those they left there is, 'There is nothing outside for you. The world says to you, you have come out of a prison; we have nothing for you; you must prove yourself.' Is it not hard to think that this occurs in a Christian land? Is it not cruel that a man should go out in hope of reform and be brought back crushed? If every Christian would let his sympathy go forth in the right direction we could save these men."

SUPERSTITION OF GOOD PEOPLE.

An obstacle to the success of the man released from a prison, Mrs. Booth said, was found in the superstition of good people that a man who had been once a criminal was always a criminal, a saying which, she said, good folks repeated with parrot-like understanding.

"It was refuted by Christ on the cross," she said, "when he said to the thief at his side: 'This day thou shalt be with me in paradise.' It can be refuted now. If I were asked what was the greatest need of prisoners I should say that it was much the same need that I have seen in the slums of great cities and in the drawing-rooms of rich families in the same great cities in which Christ was not.

"When I entered upon the work I was told that I would meet old, hardened criminals. My work was in the State prisons and not in the lesser reformatories. I met the worst class of prisoners. I was told that I should be casting my seed upon barren rock. People told me that it would be absolutely fruitless. People sometimes know too much about conditions. I am glad that when I entered upon the work I knew nothing of what had been considered to hold good in the past. After four years I can tell you that it is the most fruitful work. I find that the land is just as good and brings forth just as beautiful fruit as any. Ministers who get disheartened over the results of their preaching should go straight to the nearest state prison. It is refreshing to talk to an audience confessedly at fault, and not one in which the individual picks out the neighbor who was hit by the sermon."

LEAGUE'S MEMBERSHIP IS 8,000.

Mrs. Booth described the results which have attended the prison work in the four years of its life. The Volunteer Prisoners' league was organized four years ago. It now has a membership of 8,000 men in eleven State prisons. These men pledge themselves to an honest life and to a maintenance of the prison discipline. There is no narrow line drawn for them. They are not required to subscribe to any creed. The membership of the league comprises Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and infidels.

"I was told at first," said Mrs. Booth, "that I must not expect the results which had attended the beginning of the work to be permanent, but would have to consider them as the effects of a revival. The hopelessness of the men at first was disheartening. They said it was no use—that it would be impossible for them to do any better than they were doing. The results have proven that the forecasts of the former and the forebodings of the latter were both without foundation."

With reference to the condition of the men who come out of the prisons and enter Hope Hall temporarily, Mrs. Booth quoted the statements of people who claimed their ability to detect a man who had served a sentence by the downfallen look of his eyes and his slouching steps.

"Have we any right to make a man look so that after serving a sentence of fifteen or more years he is unable to look like other men?" she said. "Some prison regulations require a prisoner to look down whenever he passes any one. You or I would acquire the same practice if we were obliged to force ourselves to it during a period of fifteen or longer years."

PRAISES THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

Mrs. Booth praised the indeterminate sentence under which men are sent to Joliet and stated her belief that it would be universally adopted in State prisons. The abuses to which she referred and which she said stamped a man as a convict for life in his appearance were passing away. The men who had passed through homes which the Volunteers of America established in New York and Chicago, she said, have represented all classes of men released from confinement. They have included men who have served six consecutive terms and men whose service had reached twenty and thirty years. There were, she admitted, cases in which the man had been a member of the prison organization and who, after his release, went wrong and was returned to his prison. They were few, she maintained, in proportion to the men who came out and began life anew with good results.

The work is maintained now by private subscription, but it would, she stated, soon receive the support of the State, which would recognize that it meant a saving of thousands of dollars.

In closing Mrs. Booth spoke of the relation of the Volunteers of America to the churches. In willingness to work with the churches and to permit members of the Volunteers to be members of churches, she said, was found the cardinal difference between the Volunteers and the older society of the Salvation Army, which did not permit membership in churches. She disclaimed some of the methods of the older society. She said the Volunteers held to the belief that it was necessary to elevate the people among whom they worked to the standard of religion, and that it was not possible to lower the standard to the people's level with good results. Specifying, she censured the use of what she termed a "slang religion" and her audience applauded the distinctions she made.

Such a record of good work accomplished inspires one with renewed faith in human nature and the success of well directed, kindly human, reformatory effort. The "Little Mother" of 8,000 men who are serving or have served penitentiary sentences, is doing a work which high angels might be happy to accomplish.

Fruit of Heaven.

Dare we acknowledge that the title of Spiritualist belongs individually to us, unless we pledge ourselves anew, with solemn earnestness each rising morn, to consecrate our powers all to the service of the cause so dear to us, namely, the cause of Spiritualism? Can the cause of Spiritualism and of humanity be separated by the smallest fraction of one degree? We know that they can not; for these are but different names for one and the same thing. Then with the mental, or spoken enunciation of this solemn pledge of consecration, our mind must instantly fly to India, and there behold in spirit—not in imagination, the appalling picture of gloom, despair and death, while we in our comfortable beds, are perhaps content to merely wish them well, and to hope for better news next time!

We are secure in the confident feeling that this visitation of untold distress can never come to us. Judging from our actions, we recognize no responsibility attaching to ourselves while the truth is, the very horrors which they are now enduring will be yours and mine, and intensified a thousand fold, when we wake up to the consciousness of our neglect of opportunity in this matter.

It is as though in our very household, our own brothers and sisters, our own fathers and mothers and children, were starving to death by slow inches—actually dying before our very eyes, while we persist in nursing our apathy by living on in the midst of many comforts and some of the very luxuries of life, utterly neglecting—that is to say refusing, to lift one finger in the effort to relieve those stricken ones! Can such a course be less than savage? Is it not monstrous in the last degree?

True, distance intervenes; but this only serves to lessen the effect upon a certain class of minds. It does not change the principle one iota. Because we prefer to remain in the stupor of indifference toward this immeasureable array of human suffering, are we therefore released from the corresponding responsibility?

Three years ago we were weighed in the balance and as a reform body were we not for the most part found wanting? A generous response went out from our great West, as well as East, when that moan of Death was wafted across the friendly bosom of the Pacific calling for our aid at that time; but how much of this was due to the concerted work of many Spiritualists? No such work is recorded that I have seen. That opportunity was great, yet small in comparison with the present.

Much is also being done in the present crisis by the people of the nations who have not felt the famine. In the name of Humanity I ask, Spiritualists, what are we doing to electrify the world; to move on far in advance of all others in demonstrating to the slothful that the humanity impulse—a supreme desire to relieve and to prevent suffering is the chief corner stone of all true reform? If indifference toward suffering humanity has hitherto been a crime, it is henceforth the unpardonable sin.

If we proceed at once to donate something—if each Spiritualist in every community outside of stricken India, will appropriate so much money—from ten cents to ten thousand dollars—according to our means, to be forwarded there in the form of provisions, at the earliest possible moment, the effect will be like magic. The relief of those dying millions will be almost instantaneous! And this is not all, for we ourselves will be the greatest beneficiaries! Let me tell you why. Those sufferers will enjoy the food which this earth affords; but our erstwhile starving souls will literally feast on the fruit of heaven. This heavenly fruit is the gratitude of angels, expressed to us in no uncertain terms. I have tasted of this fruit of heaven. "I speak that I do know, and testify that I have seen" and felt and heard.

I appeal to you then, Spiritualists, one and all, let us fix a day, say the first Sunday after this message is received, whenever that may be, and each and all donate pro rata, as nearly as may be, a sum for the relief of these our dying comrades whose mute appeal comes to us all, from that land so near while yet so far away.

Dr. Savage's Sermon--Nellie Temple Brigham.

The summer season is upon us when the spiritual meetings and various churches close for the season, although most of our orthodox brethren keep their churches open through the hottest weather, because, I presume, they are afraid that if their church doors were closed, some of their members might seek more liberal fields.

Dr. Minot J. Savage preached his farewell sermon for the season at the Church of the Messiah, Sunday, May 6, his subject was "Sunshine and Shadow." He announced from his pulpit that he was very sorry that he should not have the pleasure of preaching to his people again until next October. It is on account of his poor health that he has gone away for a complete rest. Many thousands wish that his health may be restored to him by the coming season.

It has been surprising to me in one way that so many Spiritualists have attended Dr. Savage's sermons the past season, and then again it was not surprising, for where else could one get such true spiritual food as he has given in his season's discourse? As I came out of the church this last Sunday, a lady turned to a gentleman and said, "In case we should never have the chance to hear Dr. Savage again, what a sweet memory this discourse, 'Sunshine and Shadow,' will be to those that heard it."

Mrs. Nellie Temple Brigham closes her spiritual meetings in this city the second Sunday in June, and then goes to her beautiful home at Elm Grove in the Berkshire Hill in Massachusetts. I have at various times mailed samples of The Progressive Thinker to some of my orthodox friends in various parts of the country, and have received very kind letters from some, but the past week I received a letter from a lady in a Massachusetts town to whom I had mailed The Progressive Thinker at various times, in which she stated that she was exceedingly obliged for the papers mailed, but she still believed in old-fashioned Methodism, also an old-fashioned heaven, and an old-fashioned hell, and did not intend to change her views, and I could not help exclaiming on reading the letter that those people that liked their little hell and enjoyed it, it would be the last thing I should care to take away from them, but feel pity for them to think they cannot or will not see the true light ahead.

I wish to thank you for Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death which I have received. I am glad to possess this book if for only one thing and that is the sermon, "The Voices of the Dead," by Minot J. Savage, and that one discourse ought to make thousands want to possess the book. I heard Dr. Savage deliver that sermon some years back on an Easter Sunday, at the Church of the Unity in Boston, and at the time it was published thousands of copies were disposed of and it then went out of print, and had to be republished again. You have done a grand thing to reprint this great sermon in your new volume, and that alone ought to bring many subscribers to The Progressive Thinker to get your fine gift of Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death. If people think they are too poor to subscribe for the paper and get this fine book, I should think they would live on one meal a day and send for this grand yearly spiritual feast.

REMEMBER THOU MUST DIE.

What is ambitious hope to me?
What were a glorious name?
What would it profit me to be
First in the lists of Fame?
There is another voice I hear,
Each hour that passes by;
It harps forever on my ear:
Remember, thou must die!

I've gazed aloft upon the star
That heroes glory in,
And sometimes deemed it not too far
For even me to win;
But when to tread Fame's slip'ry track,
Ambition bade me try,
This thought forever held me back:
Remember, thou must die!

I've thought upon the charms of gold,
And fancied it were sweet,
Its smiling treasures to behold
All shining at my feet.
But when I looked upon my hoards,
Although my heart beat high,
I still could hear those burning words:
Remember, thou must die!

I tried the cup of pleasure, too,
And drained it to the lees;
But found, as all must find it true
That pleasures cannot please;
Her sparkling bowl seemed sweet awhile,
But soon the fount went dry,
And then I heard, with bitter smile:
Remember, thou must die!

Then let Ambition, Power, Fame
And Wealth and Pleasure flee—
They cannot for a moment claim
Dominion over me.
Let others in their rounds rejoice—
Let others rate them high—
Let me obey that warning voice,
Let me prepare to die.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-THREE.

In our last letter we spoke of the ancient Chinese, and intimated that they had, in the earlier ages, been sun worshipers; they also believed that their ancestors had come from the sun to the earth, and they thought at death all who had led good lives on earth returned to the sun—that is to say, the visible sun was to them what the Christian's invisible heaven is to him. They believed that the souls of the departed were traveling back and forth on the sunbeams or rays of light.

Perhaps we can make ourselves better understood if we say that to them the sun was God, the moon his wife, the stars their children, and they had names for all the big and little stars. Some were male and others female. Still they did not believe that all souls went directly to God or the sun. They knew nothing of the revolution of the planets, but thought that the sun's disk was simply the face of God, his body being invisible or, rather, concealed by cerulean draperies. If the day was bright and clear, God was pleased with them; if dark and foggy, God was displeased. If the clouds were heavy and brought rain, they thought God had gotten over his displeasure and with his two invisible hands had gathered the darkness and fog together and thrown it away from him in the form of rain, afterward smiling upon them more brightly than ever; and thus even his anger was beneficent; but when there were thunder and lightning he was very wrathful. The lightning was caused by his flashing eyes, the thunder the sound of his awful voice in anger; and when the rain came down he was beginning to be pleased once more. The winds were the breath of God, or God breathing. If the winds were heavy, God was weary; if mild, God was more at his ease; and thus of all the various manifestations of nature. They thought that God swallowed the souls of all who were worthy to become his food, and afterward purged them forth, when their virtues and best qualities had been appropriated by him; that they then again returned to earth and absorbed the virtues and good qualities of their relatives and friends and once more returned to God as servants loaded with good things for him; they were again swallowed, again purged forth; and thus they were going and coming at all times. God had also to feed his wife and children—the moon and stars—and it was considered the greatest happiness that could come to a soul, to be one of the servants worthy to feed God, or for God to feed upon.

Afterward arose the idea of feeding God with other things beside human souls, and so crept in the idea of sacrificing animal life, also fruit offerings. By thus doing, God would spare to them their children, for they thought him particularly fond of good, beautiful, innocent, little children; and possibly their other friends might not die, or go to feed God, quite so soon; for, although it was the greatest possible honor, still, love for their little ones and nearest friends sometimes conquered all other feelings. A mother's grief and tears over a sick or dying child, often caused the father to go forth to find a substitute in the form of an animal, or choice fruits, begging God to take these instead, and spare the child to its mother a little longer.

God's wife, the moon, was a little coy, and wore a veil much of the time; sometimes covering her face wholly and often partially and coquettishly drawing it aside.

When the sun went down at night, they thought he had gone to visit regions of darkness, or a place corresponding somewhat to the hell of the Christians. The earth being flat, this region was under or beneath it; they had an idea that this region was filled with horrible and grotesque monsters and all manner of things that were strange and frightful and to this region wicked or bad souls went, for God would not feed upon them, they were obnoxious to him, did not tempt his appetite, consequently, he threw them from him and they sank into an abyss and roamed in darkness beneath the earth; but they were not destined to roam there forever, for God, or the sun, went daily to see if any had repented of their follies and become good enough for him to feed upon; if so, he immediately swallowed them and the next day purged them forth and they were then able to retain their earthly friends. Their bitter experience, beneath the earth, had taken away all desire to do wrong, and they were now good and holy, or restored to be the servants of God; so, no matter what the sun might do, it was all-powerful, all-beneficent in the end.

This is a very slight, brief synopsis of what the very, very ancient Chinese believed; also what many other very ancient peoples believed; in fact, all sun worshipers had similar ideas; afterward came regular paganism as related by various historians, but we need not here enter into all the complex details of paganism; others have done this far better than we can, especially in a short letter which is to be published in a weekly paper.

Now no one at the present day should laugh at these ideas of infantile races, for they were great, grand truths in an undeveloped condition.

These ancient Chinese had no idea that there were other earths or worlds than the one on which they found themselves; but their crude minds understood, in this way, that which their eyes beheld. The struggling mind grasped the first great principles of nature, and underlying each idea was a grand truth. It is not the unsophisticated natives that are farthest away from truth, but oftener the educated, wily priest, and the rich, powerful, selfish ones of earth. The Christian religion was only Paganism artfully worked up into what is now called Christianity. Tell the fashionable popular minister of your present day, that his God was originally the Joss or Thunder God of ancient China, meaning, simply, the sun, and he would not believe you; neither would he believe that his hell was originally the region supposed to be beneath the flat earth, since worked over to suit the interests of the Romish Church. They have added the Devil and the fire—yet the idea of the Devil was borrowed from an ancient name, Lucifer, the great, bright evening star, falling, as it does, so quickly from near the zenith to the horizon and sinking out of sight sooner than any other star in the heavens. This star was also called Lucifer, the light-bearer, when it was the morning star, but it is now called Venus. It is really the planet Venus. Think of that beautiful star being the originator of the horrible idea of endless hell-fire and Satan or the Devil being cast from heaven into hell or utter darkness. Do they realize that the Christ idea was simply the Pagan idea of the birth of the new year, formerly called the Savior of the world, as it really is, for if the sun did not return to the spring and summer solstices, man and beast would alike starve and perish.

Of course you of to-day know that it is not the sun that does return, but the revolving earth as it oscillates back and forth in its revolution around the sun. Do these fashionable ministers realize that they are preaching more ignorant ideas than even their papan ancestors ever cherished—that they are really farther away from the truth than the sun-worshipers or pagans were? Such is the fact however.

Now there was a Jesus of Nazareth, as we have before stated. He was an enthusiastic reformer, as many other men have been. He is so still, as an angel and exalted teacher, saving mankind and spirits from error, leading them gently toward the light and the truth.

We have said there was a great truth underlying each idea of the most ancient peoples. First: The idea that they originally came from the sun.

Now your earth was really one of the many rings thrown off from the sun, and was not formed independently of the sun from fire-mist or star-dust or nebulæ, or from the swirl of a vortex.

Now I am a spirit and I have taken great pains to inform myself, truthfully, on this all important subject, and those speculations and theories are not the correct ones. No one ought, now, to accuse me of desiring to foist my belief on others, or magnifying my own importance, or to think that I, personally, have discovered some great truth not before known to man, therefore swell up in stubborn pride, believing myself right and all others wrong; and, by so doing, becoming a stumbling-block to all farther progress, thereby falling myself into the bogs of error and uncertainty. If all worlds were composed of star-dust, nebulæ, fire-mist, vortex swirl, and so forth, and so forth, all worlds would be alike; you would not, and could not have a variety. All would, necessarily, be either suns or moons or stars.

Now the sun of your system of worlds is the only one that gives out light and heat; the other planets have no light and heat of their own, and would not be visible to your earth at all but for the light from the sun, which is shining upon them, thus making them visible to your eyes when your part of the earth is in darkness or shadow—in its own shadow—as that part of it is turned away from the sun.

"Well," you reply, "every schoolboy understands this." Granted, that the greater part of them do; but they do not understand why the sun alone of all your system of worlds, gives forth heat and light, while the other worlds are dark and cold, neither do they, when looking at Jupiter, understand why he has belts or Saturn rings; why they each have so many moons; why your earth has a moon; why Mars presents such a strange appearance, and so forth. Your star-dust, nebulæ, fire-mist, and vortex theories, will never smooth out, nor answer, truthfully these important questions.

Now do not call my son Carlyle in question. He knows nothing of it. His whole life, thus far, has been given to music. He has never given a dozen thoughts to other worlds than the one on which he resides. Music has occupied his every thought and all his time since early childhood. He commenced teaching music when a boy, and when he was studying in Germany, with the old masters, still taught all the pupils he could obtain at that early age, himself studying day and night, giving the usual hours, recitals and recitations at the conservatory of Leipzig, and on returning to America, after helping to found the New England Conservatory, becoming its first and principal professor of piano playing, for many years; still, not content he instituted a large conservatory of his own, teaching therein all day, and every day except Sunday and playing nearly every evening, until near midnight, at various concerts and piano recitals.

No, no, my friends. He has scarcely had a moment for thought outside of music during the whole course of his life, and as for reading, he has actually never read anything except a novel or two, with occasionally a cursory glance at the daily newspapers. He has had no time for much but music. So do not blame him for anything that I, his father, may write. He has suffered enough on my account already. I swear to you, dear friends, one and all, that it is I—Franz Petersilea—the spirit, soul, or angel of his father, that controls and does this writing. He is a great and peculiar sensitive. He and I were never alike, not in the least. He found his rightful calling in music; not so was it with me. Although music was my profession, it should not have been. I have now found my rightful place or calling, and it should have been on earth just what I have now found it—a writer and a searcher after the great eternal laws and principles underlying and governing the universe. I think I have now said enough to put things in their right and proper light. I do not wish credit, name or fame. I am above and beyond all this, being a denizen of the celestial world; but, I wish to give truth to the lower world and truth alone—truth as I have found it, experienced it, lived it in my own person; but, to go on with the subject in hand—the true theory of world-building.

The true theory of world building is the atomic theory, as I myself have actually seen and found to be so. I did not discover this great truth. It was discovered thousands of years ago and taught in ancient Greece, Aristotle being one of its expounders. I have often met and held long conversations with this grand soul and most wise teacher. I have visited other worlds in company with him and others like him; and this great truth has been demonstrated to me beyond the shadow of a doubt. I have visited the sun, together with him and others, and have discovered—know positively—that it is not at all like the earths, that it is not an inhabited planet, that it is not now a compact and solid earth, that it is composed of two distinct and separate bodies, that it is now spiritual or gaseous in its nature, that it holds in solution all the elements, and many more that the men of earth know nothing about—that the light and heat of the sun is caused by the playing back and forth of the great eternal principles of which its bodies are composed, call them by whatever names it may please you, carbon, magnetism, electricity, spirit and matter, gases, positive and negative forces, hydrogen, nitrogen, oxygen, anything and everything.

One of the bodies of the sun is as black as night and the eye of man never rested upon it; the other is, apparently, a pale amber flame. They lie millions of miles apart but always directly opposite each other; they roll in their orbits exactly at the same rate. We might, to make things simple and plain, call the black body carbon and the amber one magnetism. This is as nearly true as any other form of speech that could be understood by mankind. The magnetic body is forever setting the carbonic body on fire; then, as the light and heat shoot forth, the magnetic body gathers them all up, sending them back again in great magnetic waves, so that neither the one or the other loses anything—so that the playing back and forth of these elements can and will be kept up for what would seem to man an eternity; yet, changes will eventually come to it.

The sun, in one sense, is a vast electric light; one being naturally a great chemical laboratory, the other the attractive power drawing all these elements to itself and thereby bursting into flaming light and beauty.

Now all this, as yet, has not been discovered by the scientific men of earth, but it soon will be and then many things will be clear that before were dark and beyond comprehension. No one should say, "I have got the truth and all the truth." Whenever one says this, progress is at an end; such an one puts himself in the way of all progress, although claiming to be progressive. What I have here told, I know, positively, as a spiritual being; but I do not know it all. There are countless ages yet for me to live and learn; but when we here do discover a great truth, we like, and really must if we can, give it to the earthly worlds, each to his native world if possible.

"Well," you now ask me, "how is it that the atomic theory is correct?" I will tell you in my next letter, also how the planets came to be thrown off from the sun, as they certainly have been; but, in the meantime, go and buy "The Discovered Country." You will find these great truths elaborated in detail in that book.

Now, it is not personalities we want, but truth. It is not who gives the truth but, is it truth? Personalities should be sunk in truth—the truth appearing but not the person who is used as the medium for giving it to the world. Fifty years ago as much truth was given to the world as it at that time could comprehend and make use of, but if the world were to stop there it would never get a step farther. The ones who gave great truths to the world at that time are not able now, while in the body, to go much beyond them. They have done their work, others now must take it up and go on. This is the only way to get ahead. Those whom the spirits used fifty years ago were, at that time, sensitives; but, the years have made them positive, consequently the spirits cannot use them for mediums as they formerly could. They should not clog the wheels, but be joyful that the work can still be carried forward.

The trouble we expect scarcely ever comes. How much pain the evils cost us that have never happened.—Moore.

SOMETHING MORE

About the Christian Religion

IT IS THOROUGHLY ANALYZED BY A CALIFORNIAN.

"The Christian religion," said Thomas Paine, "is an outrage on common sense; why are people afraid to think?" As a rule those who are afraid to think are afraid because they were taught in childhood that they had no right to think, their duty being to believe what the priest and the preacher told them. No greater injustice was ever done any human being than to deny his right to think and to enforce that denial through the power of fear; and yet that has ever been the mission of the advocates and exponents of Christianity. By denying the right to think contrary to their teachings, and threatening their deluded dupes with the eternal wrath of God should they do so, the priesthood has perpetuated for centuries an absurd and unreasonable system of religion, that otherwise would long ago have disappeared as a factor in the affairs of mankind. Christianity can put up no defence from the standpoint of reason that entitles it to serious consideration for one moment. Mystery and miracle are its foundation, and the only word that properly and accurately defines it is "fable." Yet look at the power it has wielded in the world and does yet, and all because of the fact it has been successful in denying the right to exercise the thinking faculties.

Childhood is pre-eminently the period of credulity, and that is the period in life to which these enemies of intellectual freedom—which is the fountain head of all other kinds—have always applied their greatest efforts. Enslave the mind in childhood and you secure your victim to superstition, has ever been the motto and the rule of action pursued by them. Said Archbishop Riordan a few years ago, "men and women may acquire religion, but it is seldom," and quoted that old maxim so aged and so accurate—"as the twig is bent, etc."

What better testimony does any man want regarding the weakness of Christianity than this from one of the church fathers? He gave the absurdity and foolishness of the whole system away when he declared the almost impossibility of getting men and women to accept it.

Verily, religion of whatever brand, has no greater foe than reason, and men and women whose minds are not stunted in childhood, have generally so developed that greatest of man's faculties that a black coat and a sanctified and solemn countenance can neither terrify nor carry conviction to the mind, when presenting their old and well-worn fable.

Mental paralysis induced in childhood is the only hope of Christianity, whether of the Catholic or Protestant movement, for neither ever did or ever will consent to let their victims reach manhood and womanhood before they try to catch them. It is just as easy to teach a child an error as a truth, for doubt has not been developed by experience, and these cunning and crafty mind-enslavers, to use a classical expression, are thoroughly onto their job.

The Sabbath school is the bulwark of Bible nonsense, and many a promising intellect is there buried so deeply under theological rubbish it never escapes the handicap in after life. Here we see the difference in marked contrast between science and religion. Science says to mature manhood and womanhood, here are some facts presented for your consideration, subject them to every possible test of reason that their truth may be established in your minds. Believe nothing because affirmed by a scientist, but probe, investigate, dissect and analyze, for facts; instead of shunning these tests invite them, and in no other way can they be established. Says religion: "Don't reason; if you do you are lost; believe, believe, believe or be damned forever!"

It is no mystery why men and women seldom acquire religion, for they have learned the use and value of reason, which, when applied to any, soon leaves it without a prop on which to rest. Religions are man-made products, and the reason we have different kinds is because different men have made them.

There is nothing in the Christian religion that is essential to the happiness of mankind, and the proof for this affirmation is found in the fact that no one feels a desire for it who was not contaminated with it in childhood. When presented to a native of Japan, China, India or Turkey, it is declined with thanks, for no want exists to make it a necessity. It presents the world with absolutely nothing that is needed, for it has only faith to present in connection with another conscious state of existence; and any one can cherish that belief if they wish, as did Plato before Christianity was ever heard of. A religion with no knowledge to give is not a very important affair, and that is Christianity exactly. Faith is not only its corner-stone but the whole foundation, and when that is founded on a fable, a rational man needs but little time to discern its real value.

Christianity has been more or less eulogized because of its standard of morals, but among them all where do we find any new ones which it gave to the world? It has presented none; and the world has always had a universal standard that fitted every time and occasion where civilization had existence. Robbery, rape, arson, murder or any form of violence are everywhere considered crimes, and we do not have to consult the mythical Jesus to find this out. When anything interferes through human agency with the fundamental law of life—self preservation—it is known and recognized by all men as a wrong, and no system of religion is required to demonstrate it.

The negative manner in which Confucius presented the so-called golden rule, is the proper way to work it, and covers the whole ground to be considered in man's relation to man. If generally practiced it would insure a world of peace and harmony compared with what we see now, and nothing that Christianity offers would do any more. Natural morality, in other words the rules for human conduct which the experience and association of human beings engender, is always sufficient to guide mankind; and no voice from the throne of God on the realms of priestcraft, is needed to shape and direct the duties of men in their social relations. But the morals of Christianity have been referred to simply to show the world has incurred no debt for them, as they contain nothing new. The principal consideration which Christianity invites, is due to its theological doctrines and its influence on the human mind. Both are not only bad but very bad, and the record of this religion, whose mythical founder left neither name nor deed on the pages of profane history, has added more to the horrors of the world and the miseries of mankind, than any other cause revealed by past records. Persecution and mental slavery have been its specialties, and the spirit of intolerance, though unable to act as freely as formerly, is just as strong in desire as ever.

Give Christianity the power it once possessed, and liberty of thought would again disappear. When one stops to analyze this monster of tyranny, and to consider what it really is, a baseless belief thoroughly organized to dominate society and government, he can but wonder at what it has succeeded in doing. Every step of human progress has met with its opposition, and every man who has dared to enlarge his creed while clinging to the name of Christian, has met with about as much hatred and persecution as the unbeliever on the outside. Stagnation in any portion of Nature's works is offensive and repugnant, but stagnated thought that is dead to live ideas and healthy progression, is the ideal condition of Christianity. It has never wanted to know anything not found in the scriptures and the creeds, and the rumpus Mr. Hillis stirred up the other day in Beecher's old pulpit by dramatically fighting a dead fake, among all rational minds, shows how quick "brotherly love" can change to something else. The man who tampers with the Presbyterian creed becomes a theological outlaw in less time than it took its immortal founder to burn Servetus, and he is told if he doesn't resign he will be kicked out.

"How beautiful it is for brethren to dwell together in unity," but in order to do so, it seems necessary not to entertain any thoughts which would fail to meet the approval of that sixteenth century fiend—John Calvin. Still if a man is really a Christian he must be a hell-fire advocate, for that is the doctrine of the book; and when renounced, it places that person among the long and growing list of unbelievers. Every revolution of the earth adds to this number, and the emancipation of the human mind from those "outrages on common sense," goes steadily on, though not rapidly enough to dispel the wonder how any person of mature age can still be bamboozled by those "impostors who deceive their fellow men." Seance With the Brockways.

I wish to relate the results of two sittings I had recently with the most wonful psychic it has been my good fortune to meet, Mr. Charles Brockway, of the Pacific coast. I have had a number of very convincing tests on previous occasions, but the nature of this one being so different and so conclusive, I consider it my duty to place it before the readers of your paper.

Eight years ago my wife's uncle, a non-believer, gave me a sealed message to have answered by a certain slate-writing medium. He intended the message as a joke on me, as he considered me the victim of a base deception. Later he gave me a message in a sealed envelope, addressed to a Spirit. I took it awaiting the opportunity to place it in the hands of a proper medium. I laid it in my trunk until that time would arrive. Years passed, and I failed to find the right medium until on the 5th of May, 1900, when I called on Mr. Brockway. I handed him my question, which was sealed by my uncle, and he immediately returned it to me. During the sitting he mentioned the name of Pottenger. I replied, "I know the name." Then he said, "Mead Pottenger." The Pottengers were friends of my family. The sitting closed and my questions were answered satisfactorily.

The next Sunday night I attended a meeting at Garfield Hall, given by the Brockway Family. Envelopes and cards were passed through the large audience for questions to be written, sealed and delivered to the platform. After listening to the beautiful music by Prof. Blume & Co., Mrs. A. Brockway delivered an impressive invocation, then I stepped to the stage and handed Mr. Brockway the sealed envelope given me eight years ago; he took it, grasped my hand and commenced to personate by words and gestures the character of a suicide and called out the name of Pottenger. "Why did I commit suicide?" Mead Pottenger then replied through the medium, Mr. Brockway, "I did not have a just cause." After repeating the same, Mr. Brockway handed me the envelope and requested it opened and read to the audience. I broke the seal and read as follows: "Is the spirit of Mead Pottenger present? Would he be willing to state why he committed suicide?" As soon as I had finished reading the above, Mr. B. started to call a number and requested it to be copied. He then told me to compare the numbers given to the number of the works as well as the case of my watch, which had not been in Mr. Brockway's touch. The numbers were found to be correct and he asked me if I would be willing to take oath that I was not a confederate of his, and I answered that I was willing to take the oath that I was not a confederate.

My next sitting was on the 8th, one of my questions addressed to the spirit of Prof. Samuel Hammitt (who gave me the sealed envelope some eight years ago, and passed to spirit life two years ago last January).

"The question you gave in a sealed envelope is answered, can and will you explain your opinion and your knowledge now and your attitude then? Is the question a parallel one with Brindle Heck? Please answer.—S. S. Hammitt."

His reply: "My boy, yes I am now fully aware of the truths I did deny; but wrong teachings were accountable, besides my stubborn will of which I have long ago repented. Yes, it was about the same as the condition surrounding Brindle.—Affectionately, Samuel Hammitt.

My questions were wrapped with blank writing paper in a sealed envelope and remained in our hands all the time the questions were all answered through the phase of independent slate-writing. Many of the questions read at the hall were written at home, and kept in their possession all the time. I consider Charles Brockway a superior psychic and medium and recommend him to all who wish a truthful message from their spirit friends. His powers must be witnessed to be appreciated.

Special Notice.

The State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota has asked us to accept a second year of service as their missionaries. Before doing so we want to hear from every possible locality in the state and learn if they will try to arrange for meetings. Many localities have failed to arrange for us during the months we have labored in the state; and in many places we have no correspondent or name of a Spiritualist. Send us names everywhere in Minnesota. Let us have some grove-meetings during June and July.

These must be arranged at once in order to secure our services. Don't wait for opportunity; but create it! Address me at once. G. W. KATES,

AN OPEN LETTER

To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of North America.

Erudite and Reverend Fathers:—The author of the subjoined epistle is as little known to fame as he is to any of the individuals composing your august body. And the weight and value of the proposed communication would neither be enhanced nor diminished by a biographical sketch of him, since the facts he intends to present would come with equal pertinency from a pope or a peasant. But as a pledge of the author's good faith, and as an earnest that he possesses a slight degree of intelligence on theological subjects, let this much be premised: His spiritual diet has been Calvinism for more than half a century. Boasting a combined Scotch and English parentage with Puritan proclivities, he was begotten—not in sin—but in Calvinism; and born—not in iniquity—but in good old Scotch Presbyterianism. He was present when two of the sectarian streams "that make glad the city of our God," merged into one at Pittsburg, in 1858, and formed the United Presbyterian Church; he subsequently evolved into the ecclesiastical body of which you—reverend fathers—constitute the visible and adjustable head. In that communion he was educated for the ministry but never ordained; he clung to the horns of its holy altar until they became so cold and clammy to the touch that he was compelled to relinquish them four years ago. And now, with the almond tree of old age flourishing, and the grass-hopper becoming a burden, like Thomas Paine, the world is his church and his religion is to do good.

These apparently trivial statements are made as the author's excuse for presuming to give you, unasked, the benefit of his experience and observation, by notifying you that the sacred ark of Calvinism is in danger of profanation. The dear old ecclesiastical craft which was the pride and joy of his youth as well as of yours, is in close proximity to a theological squall; and he feels in duty bound to apprise you of it. Less than a decade ago you decided by a safe majority that a Jonah—in the person of Dr. Charles A. Briggs, was surreptitiously on board our ship of Zion, and that the squall which then threatened to engulf her had been raised by divine anger because the culprit was fleeing from the presence of the Lord; and you confidently believed that you averted shipwreck and saved the vessel by heaving the runaway overboard. But, venerable fathers, the gale you then encountered, was less than one to sixteen compared with the Euroclydon that is now bearing down upon you. Like Paul, in his celebrated journey to Rome, you are indeed being brought face to face with the troublous times, and it seems unavoidable that you must either go down, or else lighten the ship.

A Church of England divine characterizes the present as pre-eminently the age of doubt. Like seismic tremors, doubt and dissatisfaction are running through the entire ecclesiastical fabric with lightning-like rapidity. You can hardly pick up a book, magazine, sermon, or Sunday paper but what you are confronted with evidences of theological uneasiness and rebellion. Modern thought is laying aside the grave-clothes and mummy wrappings that have fettered its movements for centuries. In all the churches of to-day a spirit of inquiry is on foot which, like an animated interrogation point, walks into the schools of the prophets and other museums of antiquated theology and demands the why and wherefore of every creedal utterance. It demands that upon every theological, as upon all other propositions, facts be submitted to the scrutiny of conscience, reason and common sense. In Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Unitarian, and even Catholic folds, ring-streaked and speckled sheep, called heretics, have found entrance in large numbers; and although the shepherd's crook or discipline has evicted some of them, the influence of the new thought cannot be eradicated.

And the thing which should cause you, as guardians of the world's spiritual welfare, to keep your weather eye open and a sharp look-out from the mast-head, is the fact that it is no trifling zephyr that you are now encountering; no mere spasmodic doubt in regard to non-essentials. In times past, doubts have caused portions of our Calvinistic Zion to quiver like a leaf, which were really frivolous. Conscientious Christians quarreled bitterly over close communion; instrumental music in public and family worship; the exclusive use of David's Psalms; whether baptism should be administered by dipping, sprinkling, pouring or plunging, and other unimportant matters. But, reverend and faithful fathers, such is not the character of the doubt that is clamoring for utterance from thousands of pews and pulpits to-day. Its distinguishing features are reverence, and loyalty to Truth. It is animated by sincere motives, and an earnest desire for fair, impartial investigation. It wants to know why the dead hand of a Constantine, a Luther, a Calvin, or a Wesley, was the only one that dared to touch the sacred ark in which rest the oracles of the living God.

It wants to know how it came about that the cowled monks of the fourth, and the old Roundheads of the sixteenth centuries, knew so much more about God, the devil, heaven and hell, than our polished divinity doctors of the nineteenth century have been able to discover.

The Doubt of to-day wants to know if it has really been proven that Wisdom died when the council of Nice and the Westminster Assembly adjourned. It wants to know upon what proof the claim is based that the fountain of revelation from God to man was forever sealed up when St. John wrote the Apocalyptic vision on Patmos.

It scans all the other departments of life—Art, Science, Literature, Invention, etc., and observes that the free exercise of reason, common sense, and honest investigation has lifted them to dizzy heights of beauty and usefulness; and Doubt wonders if it was a part of God's eternal plan that the fair form of the religion of the Christ should—Prometheus like—remain bound to the cold crags of medieval ignorance with the vultures of bigotry and superstition feeding on its vitals.

Conscript and reverend fathers, you must meet these questions now, and meet them squarely. So long as the forces of doubt dashed against the breastworks of other divisions of the Lord's army, it made but little difference to you. But now those same forces are howling and beating against the Gibraltar of Calvinism; against the domicile in which you and I were born and reared. As Grover Cleveland would say, "It is a condition—not a theory—that confronts you," and you must grapple with it.

In undertaking to calm the tempest a few years ago by casting Briggs overboard, your predecessors evidently undertook more than they thought for. The doubt that is now agitating your pool is not wholly of Briggs' manufacture—it is of a higher, holier origin. The spirit of the living and true God, whom your fathers have caricatured, is quietly pushing forward the creation of a New Heaven and a New Earth. He is bringing order out of chaos; light out of darkness; and as in the experiences of Samson, the honey of truth is being evolved out of the dead carcass of old ecclesiastical error. In short, the wave forces of Doubt and Higher Criticism set in motion by such men as Briggs, are vibrating so close to the Westminster temple of dogmatic theology, that if the power of free thought and rational inquiry be increased but a little, there will soon not be left one stone upon another of that sacred edifice that shall not be thrown down.

The recent Easter sermon of Rev. Dr. Parkhurst; the sharp assault upon the Westminster Confession, by Rev. Dr. Hillis, and the still more recent census taken by the New York Journal, showing that 75 per cent of the Presbyterian clergy demand either revision or cancellation of that sacred oracle, compel you to admit, that instead of Dr. Briggs being down in the hold of the vessel fast asleep when you cast him overboard nine years ago, he was overhauling your ancient craft thoroughly and found her unseaworthy. He denied the correctness of her chart; found that while it was no doubt sufficiently authentic for the spiritual coast traffic of the 15th century, it was utterly inadequate for the bolder navigators of the ocean of truth in the 20th century, because of the new currents of thought that are continually forming new reefs and shoals of doubt.

If Calvinism be the only correct system of theology, there was no other course to pursue except to silence the Doubting Thomas as you did. But when men of the theological breadth find bottom of a Parkhurst, or a Hillis, are willing "to shake their fists in the face of Calvin's God and fling vile epithets toward his stainless throne," rather than be forced to believe and teach such a creed, what are you going to do? Suppose there should be a bare possibility that Calvin was not plenarily inspired, and that Calvinism is not an absolutely perfect concept of God's plan of salvation; suppose the Westminster Confession does not contain "the only infallible rule of faith and practice," or state with infallible certainty God's method of dealing with his children—what then?

Oliver Cromwell, although a man of iron, nevertheless possessed a streak of theological shrewdness which placed him at the head of the Lord's army in his day. But even he stood up before the assembled divines who framed your confession and said, "I beseech you, brethren, in the bowels of the Lord's mercy, to think it possible that you may be mistaken." Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, one of the brightest intellects of her day, whose piety and sincerity have never been questioned, tells you that "Robert G. Ingersoll is a direct and legitimate product of the Westminster Confession of Faith." During the Briggs controversy, a leading Presbyterian divine in New York published this declaration: Sooner than preach to a congregation of unconverted sinners the doctrines of that Confession as they mean, I would lose my right hand." Hugh Pentecost affirms that thousands and tens of thousands of men and women, in the jury-room of their own souls, are quietly signing this verdict: "If there be no other God for me to accept than Calvin's God, I shall accept none."

Now, devout and reverend fathers, these utterances and many more like them, are harsh and heavy. They grate on the ear of a Calvinist like the imaginary wails of the damned. But do you sincerely believe they are utterly void of truth?

If it be even remotely possible that your creed is souring on the stomachs of such persons as Briggs, Phelps, Parkhurst and Hillis, does not an enlightened Christian conscience suggest that you ought to do something to modify the diet and allay the nausea?

But, venerable fathers, in addition to all those just named, and in addition to the 75 per cent of the clergy referred to, there are doubting Thomases by the thousand in the pews, who need some relief. They have no doubt whatever as to the identity of their Lord and Master. They believe He whom they love and worship is the same one who rose from the tomb of Joseph. But they do have serious doubts as to the correctness of the description of him given by the Westminster artists. They object to his miscegenation and amalgamation with the blood-thirsty Jehovah of the Hebrews. They assert that the grotesque figure of Deity drawn by those theological children in the dim twilight of a long day of ignorance and bigoted superstition, does not at all represent the God of Love who rules the universe; but is only a clumsy, miserable caricature of him.

These doubting ones also perceive that the daily life is seldom on all fours with the daily professions required of the saints. In the mad rush and whirl of business; in the unseemly tussle for the spoils of office; in the obsequious devotion to the Almighty Dollar, and to the Golden Calf in the temple of Mammon, the keen, ethical eye of the Doubting Thomas can seldom distinguish the child of the church from the child of the devil; because too often he is both.

He also observes that good, old fashioned Calvinistic sermons are very productive of empty pews in these days, and that congregations are becoming like the jewels they wear on their persons—large values in diminutive parcels. That while the ecclesiastical guillotine is at work upon the heretics inside the fold, the combined forces outside of it, are compelling the pastors to rely upon their baptized youth for new recruits; and Rum constitutes so large a factor in the world's evangelization that an English bishop declares, "In China, Japan, Africa and India we are making one thousand inebriates to each lonesome convert."

Now, consecrated fathers, is it any wonder that to an honest Doubting Thomas, a conviction should come, in spite of all he can do, that there is something rotten—not away off in Denmark—but in our beloved Zion right at home? And is it any wonder that in his helplessness, he should accept the statements of the Parkhursts that the fault lies in the creeds, and join in the demand for its overthrow? Thus it is, venerable fathers, that you find yourselves tempted—Uzzah-like—to lay unholy hands upon the ark in which are deposited Aaron's rod, the pot of manna, the emerods and other oracles of Calvin's God. And would it not be wise for you to remember Uzzah's fate? What will be the result of tampering with that confession? It is bottomed upon an unmistakable "Thus saith the Lord." What evidence have you that he has changed his mind and revoked his words? Is that which was the unchangeable will of God in the fifteenth century any the less so in the nineteenth? That creed solemnly affirms:

"By the decrees of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and some angels are predestined unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death."

If that was true two hundred and fifty years ago, why is it not true yet? If even so recently as in the days of Bobby Burns, our God was pleased to

"Send ane to heaven and ten to hell
All for thy glory,
And not for ony guid or ill
They've done afore thee"—

what assurance have you that his glory requires less or any different manifestation now? If that was God's decree once, it must be so yet, unless he has revoked it, because no one else has any right or authority to revoke it. And if he commissioned the Westminster divines to so declare his purpose, are you dead sure, reverend fathers, that he has commissioned you to repeal it?

As a part of that same decree of God, and for his glory, your confession first announced that all unbaptized infants were lost, whether belonging to Calvinistic parents or not. But under pressure of the wave started by Briggs, this was amended so as to render it possible for the unbaptized infants of Christian parents to be saved through the intercession of Jesus. If you wipe out that declaration, what will you do with the millions and billions of unbaptized infants who have already gone to hell during the past six thousand years? Will you leave them to roast and torture there, while all infants dying from this on shall be carried to Abraham's bosom? If so, how will you convince rational men and women that God is just? Will you say that the race has outgrown the curse due to Adam's sin? Or will you say that Jehovah has again changed his mind?

But a more serious trouble yet is found in the fact that the necessity for the creed itself, and for the complicated machinery of orthodox Christianity, arises from the existence of a personal Devil and a literal hell. The one is the corner stone of your ecclesiastical structure, and the other the keystone in its arch. Without the rebellion of Lucifer there would have been no Devil. Without the Devil there would have been no temptation of Eve, and no original sin. Without original sin, there would have been no angry father, and no need of hell; and without these there would have been no crucified Savior and no Christian church. Will you, dare, consecrated fathers, to remove the corner-stone and arch, and allow the sacred structure of the fathers to tumble into ruins? If you do, then drape your pulpits in mourning and bow your heads in sorrow, for then will it be literally true that:

"Your church is a corpse—you are guarding its tomb;
The soul of your system has fled;
The death knell is tolling its terrible doom;
It tells you, the Devil is dead.

"Woe comes upon woe; it is dreadful to think
Hell's gone, and the demons have fled;
The damned should have broken their chains—every link;
The jailer who bound them is dead.

"Camp-meetings hereafter will be needed no more;
Revivals are knocked on the head;
The orthodox vessel lies stranded on shore—
Its captain—the Devil—is dead."

Consecrated fathers, it is hardly necessary to add, that you have the sympathy of the undersigned, because you will not thank him for it. Neither will it do you much good, because the die is cast; and in front, rear, and on either side, a relentless fate hedges you in. Unlike the fabled Odysseus, if you do not attempt to pass the Scylla of revision, you will lose more than six followers; and if your creed doctrines be true, the fearful Charybdis of divine anger will gulp you down, root and branch, if you interfere with the dread Shekinah of Calvinism.

Fathers, let the time past of your lives suffice to have wrought the deeds of the flesh and the will of the Devil. Long enough have ye "fought and wrangled o'er shadows light as air," long enough have ye turned friends to foes by offensive utterances of opinions. At last the light is breaking, ushering in the dawn of a better day. Never, more than once, in any age comes such an opportunity for men to show themselves men or menials as now comes to you. Then,

"Dare to be true—all unshackled and free,
Unfettered and bold, on land and on sea;
Determined to ne'er let soul-blinding error
Inspire with dread or fill you with terror.

"Dare to be true—and forever obey
The spirit within—that leads not astray;
To nobody yield for praise or for pelf,
But aim to be ever Lord of yourself."

A CARD.

The principals of Belvidere Seminary would respectfully inform their friends and the public generally that this institution will be open during the summer and early autumn for the accommodation of children and adults who seek freedom from business cares or the excitement of social and fashionable life. Its location is healthy and beautiful, its grounds ample and well shaded, drainage and water excellent.

Belvidere, as its name indicates, is a beautiful inland town, in Northern New Jersey, 700 feet above the sea, and surrounded on all sides by forest-covered hills, at the base of which flow the Pequest and Delaware rivers, along whose banks are many places of special interest to artists and all lovers of the picturesque in nature.

Its streets are well shaded and lighted with electricity. In its near vicinity are well cultivated farms, from which a fresh supply of milk, eggs, butter, fresh fruits and vegetables can be had daily. It is only twelve miles from Easton, Pa., and ten miles from the Delaware Water Gap. It is easy of access from New York and Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania and Delaware, Lackawanna & Western railroads, with six trains running daily each way. Its walks and drives are exceptionally fine, presenting an ever pleasing variety of river and mountain scenery. Here is just the place for the weary to find repose and the recreation that invigorates without fatiguing. For further particulars, address A. C. BUSH,

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

THE PUBLIC CIRCLE.

While speaking of the public presentation of Spiritualism, it may not be amiss to discuss briefly the pros and cons of the public circle.

There are very few societies but have a public circle either on Sunday or on some day in the week, and often they are very largely attended.

The aim of such circles is to convince the outside public of the truth of spirit return, and to give those who are investigating an opportunity of obtaining some evidence of the powers which we claim for ourselves, and of the phenomena of which we have spoken to them.

Now comes the question, and an extremely important one: Does the public circle fulfill the purpose for which it was instituted?

In order to answer this question it is necessary to divide these circles into two classes—those which have the true end in view, and those which are merely run for the amount of money which can be obtained by their means.

Not only so, but it is also necessary to know how the circles are conducted.

Where the open circle is in capable hands it becomes a real power for good. It provides just that opportunity for spirit communion which the anxious enquirer has been seeking, and as a result is a very important factor in the upbuilding of a strong society.

Such undoubtedly fulfill the true end for which they were established.

Unfortunately, however, there is a reverse to this picture, and a reverse which is too often apparent.

The public circle was never intended to be a developing circle, and yet this is what it frequently becomes in the hands of incompetent conductors.

The whole subject of Spiritualism is sufficiently mystifying to an investigator when presented by a trained and fully developed medium, but what must it appear to one utterly ignorant of the very rudiments if its teachings when sitting in a circle and listening to the unintelligible jabbering of some control, or witnessing the struggles of a partially entranced medium?

The stranger in many cases departs from such a scene with a deep-seated wonder in his mind as to how intelligent people can be found to sit together under such conditions. The whole thing appears to be ludicrous to him, because he has been introduced to the subject by the wrong entrance.

The development of the medium should take place in private or among the members of the Society alone, and it should never be permitted a partially developed medium to pursue his medial culture under the eyes of the curious and probably skeptical public.

There have been instances in which the general public have attended these open circles for the express purpose of having some fun at the expense of the undeveloped "performer."

It is extremely sad to contemplate such a state of things, and to recognize that, if only in a few cases, this noble institution, with such grand possibilities, has been so debased.

When people know something of the philosophy of development, and have shown an interest in the society's work, and are anxious to go farther into the subject, then it is quite soon enough to admit them to a developing circle; but to turn the public seance into an exhibition of partially developed mediumship for the delectation of those who choose to pay, and who have probably no more than a passing interest in the matter, is suicidal to the highest interests of our beautiful truth.

Then once more the momentary aspect comes to the front. "Our funds are low," says the treasurer of a society; what shall we do to raise money?"

"Oh! let us have a public circle, and charge a penny admission," says a member of the committee, and in spite of the protest of one or two of the members who object to "making a show of the thing," it is carried unanimously.

Money is needed, and it must be raised somehow; and as the public is always pleased to see something novel, especially when the entrance fee is so low, this is a sure and certain means of satisfying the treasurer.

With this spirit behind the enterprise the result will very soon be apparent, and the society will lose more than it will gain.

These circles need to be under the control of a sensible person with a good deal of tact and firmness combined; and if an undeveloped medium will continue to "demonstrate" in public, then there should be no scruples on the conductor's part about asking him to desist.

If the medium urges that the "power" is too strong, and he cannot resist the influence, then the conductor has only one course, and that is to request the medium in question to abstain from attending the public circle until he has gained more self-control.

In the public seance it is necessary to present the very best and most highly developed mediumship it is possible to obtain.

If a society has no fully developed media, then it will be better for such to wait until they are able to rely upon some one or more mediums ere venturing to issue invitations to the public, asking them to attend an exhibition of spiritual gifts.

What a power for good the public circle may become! How much splendid work it often accomplishes where the pitfalls are avoided, and some sensible, tactful person is at the head conducting matters.

There is no doubt as to its possibilities. Many people are first drawn into Spiritualism by its phenomena. The presentation of some striking test fastens upon their minds and sets them thinking, and from thence they are led on step by step.

But the number of people who have gone away from a badly-conducted public circle disgusted with its conduct is great, and it should be the endeavor of every society to see that this branch of its work is attended to thoroughly, that the very best man or woman shall be chosen to watch over its destinies, and that none but the best forms of mediumship shall be presented. Then, with the public circle a spot where the earnest inquirer could meet with reliable evidence, it would become a feeder to the society and one of its most useful adjuncts.

LIGHT, LONDON, ENG.

THE SPIRIT TEMPLE.

In our contemplations, aspirations, and inquiries concerning spirit-life it is as necessary to be "firm-rooted on the earth" as to mount towards heaven. We grow from the mother earth, and life's bloom and fruit, however rare and rich and beautiful, belong to the earth. So there is a deep truth in the statement that only experience teaches. We shall probably pass on to modes of being that will utterly uproot us, and make all the conditions of our tree-like life here almost ridiculous—probably incomprehensible; at once a lost memory and a lost sense. But, while we are here, the best we can hope for is that we shall be "like a tree planted by the rivers of water."

But, leaving that symbol of the tree, and passing on to what it was intended to suggest, as the earth-rooted condition of being, we may perhaps be helped by it to understand a little better what we have been accustomed to call the childish picturings of unseen things. For instance, even the Bible must be credited—or debited—with such picturings. There is much that is lovable, tender and beautiful in that description of the New Jerusalem, in the Book of the Revelation; but the stage is too small, the details are too theatrical, the tout ensemble is too toylike for our larger conception of anything that we can call "heaven." We need a boundless universe, not a highly finished Oriental city, for the magnitude and complexity of our spiritual dream.

The writer of this exciting and profound book tells us that in the New Jerusalem he saw no temple, for the Lord God, the Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof; but elsewhere in the book the temple is often mentioned, as a measurable and habitable place; and, of the blessed ones, it is said, "They serve Him day and night in His temple." True he was no bigot, and had glowing and generous thoughts concerning the saved, 'a mighty multitude that no man could number"; but his temple was a spiritual building and his heaven was a place. We must amend that; and, still "firm rooted on the earth," must use our later knowledge and wider range to find the eternal temple and the adequate heaven elsewhere.

In truth, the real Temple of God is the Universe. As the waters cover the sea-bed so does the divine presence flood all space, both the here and the herein. And all common things, as well as all saintly beings, serve Him day and night in His temple—nothing too high, nothing too low for that. The lovely blue of the washed June sky and the surging clouds of the wild March weather; the glorious fresh mountains and the rank, misty fens; the grand ocean and the puddle in the street; the golden gorse, the purple heather, the green and slimy ooze of the pool hard by; the happy, unreflecting child, the silent old man, senile, forgetful, waiting to be gone; in a sense, all the philosophers and the fools, the good and the bad, serve Him day and night in His temple—and all are on the march.

And the angels in Heaven, how do they serve Him? By singing one unceasing Psalm? by being as happy as they can be, and glorifying Him in the golden streets, surrounded by the precious stones, jasper and sapphire, amethyst and beryl and emerald; and every gate a pearl? Ah, no! "Are they not all ministering spirits?" and may they not serve Him by going into the hells, by seeking and saving that which is lost, as they and the Master did earth? The need must be there; O, such a bitter need, when we think of the fools and idlers and criminals we pour daily into the Unseen—a ceaseless stream!

There will be plenty of infirmaries and hospitals; plenty of spiritual bathrooms and reformatories and lunatic asylums there, and the angels who are worth anything will have no time for idling with harps and palms. They need not sadden or alarm us. But that need not sdden or alarm us. We shall never be afraid, or tired, or despondent any more.

How do we know this is so? How do we know what justice is, what love is, what pity is, or what God the Father is? The instincts of the spirit are as real and as authoritative as the senses of the body; and that to which the mounting spirit bears witness now is a prophecy and pledge. There is a law of progress everywhere, and that law bears witness to itself by longing and appetite and the testimony of the deep inner self. And the higher the spirit is, the higher must its need of action be; and the higher its need of service. That is so here, and we have a perfect right to infer, we are indeed compelled to infer, that it will be so in an intenser degree as we ascend "the hill of the Lord." It was the highest who said that "the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister;" and that is true over a larger area than we have imagined. Besides, God, so far as we can see, ever works through instruments; we are "co-workers" with Him now; and it is our happy privilege to believe that this will never cease to be the case.

It is precisely the Spiritualist who finds it natural to believe these things, and to believe them without dissevering himself from the things that belong to experience; so that his thoughts of life in the Unseen show him his way in this jungle of things seen. "This, too, then," he says, "is God's temple. I have not to wait for it until I 'get to heaven,' for all heaven is here.' He sees that it is a delusion to suppose that God is present somewhere else more really than here. He knows that what is coming is, not more of God, but more power; emancipated faculties, to see and feel Him, to receive and respond to Him. "This little room is a part of His temple," says the Spiritualist, "this desk, this counter, this school-room; and there are last things that will be first." And so he comforts himself. He may seem to be a long way off from God and Heaven and the angels sometimes; but he knows the reason. He knows that all about him there are wondrous possible sights and sounds—the splendor and the music of the New Jerusalem, only he is blind and poor and cold; but he knows that presently he will feel the radiance, that he will be rich, that he will see.

CURED HER CANCER.

The Remarkable Cure of a Case that was Pronounced Hopeless.—Dispels Cancer Without Pain.

Mrs. F. M. Wisner, a prominent lady of Forest, Lewis county, Washington, suffered for years with a cancer located almost in her eyeball; she tried everything without receiving benefit; her case was pronounced hopeless. Physicians stated that if her life were saved it would be a miracle, but that there was no earthly power that could save her eyesight. She was entirely cured without endangering either life or eyesight, and the cure was perfected without pain through the wonderful curative power of the combination of oils discovered by Dr. Bye. This remarkable remedial agent, which cures cancer, tumors, catarrh, piles, fistula, ulcers, eczema, and all skin and womb diseases, will will go down into history as the most remarkable discovery of the age. For years it was thought a surgical operation was necessary to cure cancer. But in this glorious century, in which science has taken such rapid strides, it has been proven that a surgical operation will only relieve for a time, and the cancer will break forth again with greater pain and energy. Dr. Bye, the eminent physician of Kansas City, Mo., has discovered soothing, balmy oils that will positively cure all cases of cancer, no matter where located or of how long standing, without the surgeon's knife or without applying burning plasters. These soothing oils go directly to the root of the trouble and without pain remove this malignant affliction which is so dangerous and painful. Thousands of noble men and women throughout the country have sent words of gratitude and praise, stating that they owe their very life to this new discovery, which cured cancers physicians pronounced hopeless.

An illustrated book on cancers and a long list of testimonials, also much information on this grand discovery, will be sent anyone writing to Dr. Bye, Room 102, 9th and Broadway, Kansas City, Mo.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IT IS A MOST EXCELLENT WORK.

This work is by DR. M. L. SHERMAN, assisted by PROF. W. F. LYON. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substances; Animal Intellects; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

The Church Not Christian.

The National Christian Citizenship League of Chicago, at a late session read letters from various distinguished clergymen, in reply to the question: "Is the Church Christian?" A few extracts are given below from those replies.

Wrote Rev. R. Heber Newton, Rector All-Souls' Church, New York:

"The teachers of the church, for the most part, are far from following the teachings of Jesus. Nay, they are far from recognizing what those teachings are. The organization of the church is planned and patterned upon a policy which is the very antithesis of a true society of Jesus. Commercialism dominates the organization and conventionality tyrannizes the pulpit. The law of the market rather than the law of the mount, is accepted by the church at large. Our Protestant churches are composed, for the most part, of a constituency drawn from the well-to-do classes, and they see nothing essentially unsound or unethical in the economic system of the day. The pulpit, therefore, is rarely free to deliver its soul, if it has one, upon the burning questions of our generation."

Rev. Ernest H. Crosby, New York, wrote:

"For some reason or other the ministers of Christ seem to be the most bloodthirsty class in the community. Nor is this state of affairs confined to this country. In England, with scarcely an exception, all the clergy, Anglican and nonconformist, are enthusiastic supporters of the Transvaal war. Frederic Harrison, the positivist; Herbert Spencer, the evolutionist, and John Morley, the Agnostic, have been left to do the work of Christ, while the Anglican primate of Ireland has been writing verses in praise of all war and this war in particular, and the whole bench of bishops has said 'Amen.'"

Rev. Edwin D. Wheelock, whose address is not given in the report, wrote:

"Would anyone dare claim the present social and economic system is in harmony with the gospel? Yet, in no quarter is any change in these matters so violently opposed as in the church. Ecclesiasticism stood for chattel slavery until it became necessary to wipe it out in blood, and she stands for the present wage slavery which makes the welfare of one man to depend upon the ability of another man to make profit out of him."

Susanna M. D. Fry, who we judge is a church official, wrote:

"The time is not far past when to ask the question involved in our subject would brand one as an unbeliever, if not an infidel. To-day the earnest, honest questioning about the embodiment of Christ's teachings in the church is the sound of the gong in the tops of the mulberry trees. Ordained preachers, creeds, formulas, ceremonies, apostolic succession, do not satisfy the people and infallibility is a dead dogma."

Honest churchmen would be glad could they erase their past history. Their present normal standing is but little better.

Sects Among Catholics.

It is not generally known, nevertheless it is doubtless a fact, that Catholicism is more largely divided into sects, each warring on the others, than is Protestantism. Rev. Leonard W. Bacon, in a late number of the "Outlook," discussed this subject at some length. We can only spare room for the following extract:

"Catholicism has invaded the Philippine Islands with some dozen competing organizations, as diverse from one another and as independent of one another, and as bitterly jealous of one another, at times, as any of the missionary sects of Protestantism. The widest theological divergence to be found among Protestant sects is perhaps that between Calvinistic Presbyterians and Arminian Methodists. Is the divergence between these any wider than that between the theology of the Augustinians and that of the Jesuits? There is a wide contrast between the sober and scholarlike ways of the Congregationalists and the methods of the Salvation Army; is it any wider than that between the Benedictine and the Capuchins? The contentions and rivalries between Methodist and Baptist, between Episcopalian and Presbyterian, have sometimes been unseemly and wrong; have they ever approached in venom, the mutual animosities of the rival regular orders in the Roman Church, and (as in the Philippines to-day) between the secular priests and all regulars? Where in Protestantism is sectarian division so forced on public attention as by the difference between shaven priests and bearded monks, and the difference of black friars, gray friars, white friars, shodden friars, and barefoot friars, all contrasted with the semi-secular costume of the Jesuit?"

Not a Practical Proposition.

The New York Observer, Presbyterian, discoursing on the prevailing famine in India, lately said:

"The most economical method of famine relief in the long run, would be to Christianize the world, and so make famine next to impossible."

Said Jesus, as inerrantly reported:

"Take no thought of the morrow; for the morrow shall take care of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."—Matt. 6:34.

That is pure and unadulterated Christianity, just as it is claimed to have come from the mouth of its founder.

Until commerce came to the aid of the world famines were common occurrences throughout Christendom. England has been repeatedly visited by "the scourge that wasted at noonday." Ireland, Christian Ireland, with all its wealth and industry, because of the failure of the potato crop, God having been unmindful of his worshipers and withheld his fructifying rains, almost desolated that unhappy island in 1848.

A private letter before us, from our good friend J. A. Balfour, Esq., an author and journalist of Bombay, India, of date August 12, 1899, said:

"We have had a bad monsoon here this year. I am afraid there will be a partial failure of crops. That means death to a multitude of poor natives. I hope this will not be so severe as was the one of a few years ago."

The hopes of our friend did not stay the disaster, caused by the monsoon, which only heaven in its munificence could have prevented. The God so watchful of the sparrow's fall, neglected the care of man. Though he gave seedtime he withheld the harvest. Frosts cut down the growing crops, and rain refuses to fall quite as often in Christian countries as in heathen countries. With failing harvests came Want, Disease and Death. We saw this exemplified in Christian Cuba only two years ago.

If the Master was obeyed to the letter, and no thought was given the morrow, the Observer's proposition would be correct; for famine, so far as man is concerned outside of the tropics, would be quite impossible. There would be neither Christian nor heathen left to suffer. All would soon be gone, and only the wild monsters of the forests would remain to prey on each other.

The Christianity of to-day is not the Christianity whose servants set out on proselyting tours, taking neither scrip nor staff, wandering from door to door, subsisting by begging, shaking the dust from their feet, and threatening those who refused to supply their needs, with woes more terrible than those of Sodom and Gomorrah; but it is a Christianity largely modulated and reconstructed by science within the last three hundred years, whose votaries were opposed, ostracised, imprisoned, tortured and burned by Christians.

If God, in his great wisdom and goodness, will hold Christians in restraint, and prevent great wars instigated by his priests, professedly to advance his kingdom; will prevent his worshipers from molesting labor, and robbing the people in the form of tithes or donations to sustain an indolent and worthless priesthood; will stay his frosts and floods, and give suitable warmth for the growth of vegetation, accompanied by occasional showers, such as verdure demands; will prevent the propagation and spread of insects and vermin, and will act the part of a good parent, not requiring man to obey the unwise direction of his Son, to neglect all earthly duties and only lay up treasures in heaven; then give him health, and if man cannot or will not provide for himself, let him be damned. He would deserve it; but belief or disbelief in Christianity will not change the result.

There Are No Christians.

"The Interior," the Presbyterian organ of Chicago, said the other day:

"The truth must be confessed, the religion of Jesus Christ in its purity never has been popular, nor is it to-day. Popular Christian systems are found to have an infusion of non-Christian elements. They must have something in them that answers to and gratifies ordinary human nature."

That sane Christian does not exist who, if smitten on one cheek, will turn the other also; who if his coat is taken will give up his cloak; who if compelled to go a mile will go two miles; who will give to all who ask, and never turn the borrower away; who will love his enemies, and bless those who curse him; who will take no thought of his life, or what he shall eat or drink, or wear. And the one who will take no thought of the morrow is doubtless demented. Tested by the touchstone Jesus gave: "If they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them;" then there are no Christians.

No, such teaching is not popular, and yet this is what the biographers of Jesus say he taught. Indeed, they would constitute distinctive traits in the character of Christians, if observed by them, and they would cease their aggressions on others.

We have maintained very earnestly in these columns for a long time, that they who are posing as Christians are the successors of ancient Roman Pagans. We have shown from time to time that every characteristic of the Christian is but modulated Paganism. The Interior editor seems to meet us half way when he says: "Popular Christian systems are found to have an infusion of non-Christian elements." We only differ with him in the opinion that that "infusion" is the sum total of Christianity, an impracticable and worthless concoction, bitter to the taste, corrosive in its action, poisonous in fact, prejudicial to public interests, and the sooner it is discarded, and a new system, the product of well-developed brains, is substituted in its place the better for the race. The unthinking heart formulated the old creeds, hence their worthlessness, as is the system they represent.

President H. D. Barrett.

The Banner of Light, the oldest Spiritualist paper published on this earth to-day, has at last passed into the hands of Mr. Barrett, who will in the future shape its entire policy. The Banner, the principal pioneer paper devoted to our cause, has been instrumental in doing a grand work for Spiritualism, and we have no doubt that in the future it will prove equally as efficient in the advancement of our philosophy. Every Spiritualist in the land will feel an abiding interest in this old landmark of our cause, and hope that it will at least reach its hundredth year of publication, and, that even then Mr. Barrett's name may stand forth as its editor.

"Human Culture and Cure. Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments). By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price 75 cents.

Miracle Is Law Not Understood.

Bishop John H. Vincent, of the Methodists, at the Auditorium, this city, two Sundays ago, said:

"There are three interpretations of Bible miracles: 1. They are literally true; 2. They are idealized history, based on fact; 3. They are like other literature, a blending of facts with opinions and local governings."

The Bishop then went on to say:

"It is enough to know the Bible is divine and an infallible guide to duty and to character."

Leaving the churchman and his "creed," as the Bishop called it, at this point, The Progressive Thinker offers as the best definition of a miracle: "A deviation from the known laws of nature." The time has been when every product of natural law was counted a miracle. The springing blade, the ripened harvest, like day and night, light and shade, the changes of the seasons, the flowing of the rivers, the movement of the clouds, the falling of rain and snow, all were produced by special interposition of Providence. As knowledge advanced miracles decreased in numbers until now, save with the very ignorant, very few remain. That few will soon be succeeded by science, which will explain how all are produced.

When the ancients saw the sun rise in the morning, ascend to the zenith, then slide down the western decline to the horizon and was lost to sight, to reappear the next morning in the East, it was impossible to account for it on any other hypothesis than that a God had that marvelous task in charge. They credited it to Apollo, also known as Phoebus, identical, say most mythologists, with Horus, the son of Osiris and Isis.

Until 400 years ago the whole machinery of the universe was a sealed book to even the learned; and the religious beliefs of that day, projected into modern times, were predicated on the ignorance of those earlier ages.

Though moderns have corrected their natural philosophy, the dominant religion has not adapted itself to enlarged knowledge. The miracle, with slight changes as to the personages who manipulate the wires, still goes on and will until men apply the teachings of science to religious affairs.

There is no miracle in Nature. Everything pertaining to matter is governed by immutable law. Men may be ignorant of that law, and ascribe to miracle what they have not ability to comprehend. It was so in the past. It remains the same to-day. Always keep this postulate in mind, then strive to master the law which produces the physical results. The spirit world is no less subject to law than is the material world.

The clergy talk very glibly about God's power, and his ability to change at pleasure. The proposition is necessarily a false one, and is based on the Bible-teaching of a repentant God, doing things to-day and reversing his action to-morrow. The God of the Universe, the "Spirit of Nature," as designated by Shelley, has neither the will nor the power to change—or reverse his own action; and the miracles of churchmen only betray the ignorance or the chicanery of those who promulgate them.

Suppressed Leaf from History.

Sympathizers with the church, they who would make Spiritualism a subsidiary organization to Christianity, seem greatly distressed when the truth is told about its beginnings. They don't want anything written or published that is prejudicial to their claim that learning, morality, all the virtues, including the nobility of woman, were outgrowths of the teaching of Jesus. One fact, not often referred to, showing how they treated the mothers of the race, may be interesting as a matter of history.

Mrs. Gage, in her invaluable work, "Woman, Church and State," copies of which are for sale by The Progressive Thinker, as will be seen by our advertising columns, says substantially, pages 214, 215:

"Save among some savage races it has been regarded as evidence of the deepest sensuality for women to appear unclothed before man, yet throughout the history of Christianity from its earliest years women were required to divest themselves of clothing before baptism. * * During the earliest days of Christianity women were baptized quite nude in the presence of men, by men, their bodies being afterwards anointed with oil by the priest who had baptized them. One of the earliest schisms in the church arose from the protest of women against the indignity, their demand to be allowed to baptize those of their own sex, and the opposition of men to this demand. * *

"What must be our conception of a Christian custom that placed nude maidens and wives in the very hands of men, not alone for baptism but also for anointing with oil? Nude baptism is still practiced when converts are received into the Greek church, no position or station in life excusing from it, Catherine, the first wife of Peter the Great, being baptized in this primitive Christian manner."

Mrs. Gage, in foot notes, quotes many authorities in support of her statements. Without incumbering this brief article with them, it may be well to cite a portion of a note on p. 498 of "The Prophet of Nazareth," wherein the author makes many citations to old writers and says:

"The candidates were both baptized in a state of nudity; both males and females in the presence of one another."

Of course this custom was changed as civilization advanced, but it is woman herself with her natural modesty, who is entitled to the credit for the reform, not the church, nor the fathers of the church, who only copied pagan customs in their baptisms, it not being an original rite with Christians, nor with John the Baptist, as the general reader supposes.

Fraternal Call.

Last week our sanctum was illuminated and enlivened by the genial presence of the proprietor of the Light of Truth and its editor, Willard J. Hull. Mr. Townsend has a stupendous mining project on hand which he hopes in the not far distant future will be made a grand leverage in the consummation of great humanitarian projects in harmony with the lines laid out from time to time by The Progressive Thinker. On our first page this week, under the head of "Humanitarian and Angelic Work," we refer to the great good accomplished by Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth in the Hope Hall, of New York and Chicago. While Mr. Townsend has another segment of the reformatory work in view it is none the less important, and will no doubt become a useful factor in rightly shaping or preparing human souls for not only this sphere of existence, but the next also. Mr. Hull, who has had a new light flashed into his soul lately, will be an important and efficient factor in aiding Mr. Townsend in the great work he is contemplating in the future. We wish them both unbounded success.

DID GOD DO IT?

A Very Suggestive Query About INFINITE INTELLIGENCE.

:o:

As set forth by G. W. Foote, in the Freethinker, of England, there were storms all over the south of England on Easter Monday, resulting in much damage to property and a considerable loss of life. A young woman, named Annie Friend, was killed by lightning while standing on the sands at Ramsgate. After striking her head—if we can say "after" in a movement which is practically so instantaneous—the lightning passed right down the left side of her body to the feet, causing the boot on her left foot to burst. Of course a coroner's jury had to "sit" upon the poor young woman's dead body, and they brought in a verdict of "Death by an act of God." It does not appear they took any evidence on the point. We do not read that they discussed whether it was God or the Devil who killed that young woman as she was enjoying herself on a Bank Holiday. They probably followed the directions of the coroner, who in turn followed the old usage of our pious ancestors. Before the days of science, in the days of real Christianity, people regarded all special occurrences as acts of Providence. Sunrise and sunset—things that happened every day, and with the utmost regularity—were part of the ordinary course of nature; but a blight or a drought, an earthquake or a volcanic eruption, a deadly plague or a very severe thunderstorm, were particular visitations of the Almighty. If a man expired on his bed, he died from natural causes; but if he expired suddenly from heart-disease, or still more suddenly from a stroke of lightning, he died by the Act of God. It wasn't murder, and it didn't look natural, so they put it down to the Lord. And this old notion still survives in occasional verdicts at inquests, and in bills of lading, where the liability of the shipowner for the safety of the cargo is declared to be void by "the act of God or the Queen's enemies"—both these parties being lumped together as dangerous and destructive, and of quite incalculable malignity.

According to that Ramsgate jury, however, they arrived at the conclusion poor Annie Friend was killed by God; and there the matter ends for the common herd of unreflective persons, and the selecter fold of credulous superstitionists; but, not belonging to either of those varieties of human dough—either half baked or dry baked—we beg to ask, respectfully yet firmly, Did God do it? We say respectfully, because it does not seem respectful to believe God capable of murdering a young woman on Ramsgate sands, and on a Bank Holiday, without satisfactory evidence. It is all very well for the orthodox Christian to regard our curiosity as blasphemous, but it really seems more blasphemous on their part to let their deity suffer under such a dreadful imputation. We cannot admit that their desperate or thoughtless hurry is a valid excuse for swearing away his character.

On one theory it is indisputable that God did kill poor Annie Friend; we mean the theory of his Omniscience and Omnipotence. "I create good and evil, I the Lord do all these things" is the language, and the true language, of severe Monotheism in Isaiah. "Kismet!"—It is the will of God!—cries the monotheistic Mohammedan, in the face of death or disaster; and the exclamation is both pious and logical; for, if God be omniscient, nothing happens without his knowledge, and if he be omnipotent, nothing happens without his sanction. What he does, and what he permits to be done, are effects from one and the same ultimate cause, resultants from one and the same original fount of power. From this conclusion there is no logical escape. You may set up a Satan, or talk of man's free-will, or indulge in other intellectual subterfuges; but if you take the trouble to think you come at last to God as the Supreme Creator, and perceive all created things act by his permission, and therefore by his authority; or you are obliged to limit his wisdom and power, to confront him with an eternal opponent, and degrade him from an allwise, almighty being into one who is perpetually frustrated and only succeeds in doing the best he can in the circumstances. In one sense, therefore—that is to say, on the theory of pure Monotheism—the question, Did God do it? must be answered in the affirmative. On that theory God does everything—good, bad, or indifferent. Light and darkness, beauty and ugliness, pleasure and pain, joy and misery, are all his handiwork. He makes the leopard and the gazelle, the shark and the swimmer, the slayer and the slain. He molds our faces to the smile of happiness or the contortion of suffering. His will is destiny, and all morality disappears under his fiat.

The usual refuge from this dilemma is the pious idea that the whole matter is "a mystery," which will be cleared up some day, not in this world, but in the next. Some time, perhaps hundreds or thousands of years after the undertaker has done with us, we shall be fully enlightened. Then we shall understand that all the misfortunes and miseries of this world, and maybe of other worlds, are parts of one infinite plan of love and happiness. We shall look back on our old sorrows and see that they were joys in disguise; we shall remember our old toothaches, and see that we were really full of pleasure while we thought we were suffering and knew we were swearing. Yes, it will all come right at the finish; at least the clergy say so, and they ought to know, for they take millions of money every year on the supposition that they do, and they all profess to be very intimate with the mind of God.

But all that heavenly illumination is reserved for the sweet by-and-by. For the present, at any rate, the ways of the Lord are fearful and wonderful—to use the Psalmist's language about his own body, probably after consulting many physicians about an incurable internal complaint. Reverting to the case of poor Annie Friend, it is hardly worth while discussing whether the Devil killed her; first, because that personage has rarely been accused of such crimes; and, secondly, because twelve jurymen and a coroner, presumably all Christians, have decided that God killed her. According to that verdict, God committed a murder on Easter Monday; and the logical result should be an order for his arrest on a charge of willful homicide. But it would perhaps be extremely difficult to execute the warrant. A crazy German once addressed a letter to "God in Heaven," and the postoffice returned it as "insufficiently addressed." It is impossible to find a being who is everywhere. Being everywhere in general, he is nowhere in particular; and we venture to suggest that it was for this reason the old Hebrew writer asked, "Can man by searching find out God?"

For our part, we shrink from believing that God committed a deed for which any human being would be hung. We prefer to believe that Annie Friend happened to stand in the path of the lightning, which, like all other natural forces, acted under blind necessity, without any moral or immoral intention, either in it or behind it. Some people call this a cheerless philosophy, but we think it better than belief in a divine assassin.

SOME THOUGHTS

About Elder Myrick's Appeal. AN EARNEST PLEA FOR MUSIC.

:o:

To the Editor:—I was deeply interested in the articles by this gentleman dealing in our treatment of Christians, as they opened the way for the consideration of topics which to the Spiritualist are far more profound than that which has given us his vigorous protest. With this, however, I am in most perfect accord. I go farther. To the Christian as to the Pagan who has not the light on things spiritual, it is my duty to extend greater kindness than to one of my own faith—this as the teachings of the decarnate in the ever enunciated doctrine of the human brotherhood; and also as the simplest matter of policy, on the principle that a smile is a better weapon than a club in the work of conversion. I also agree that the definition of religion as biblically given (James 1.27) is correct—benevolence and kindness—to be good and to do good the true religion. It is however, inconsistently conspicuous that creeds absurd and untrue are found intertwined with a truth held to by all religions. In illustration it is only necessary to name one of these, one that is constantly filling our penitentiaries and asylums with criminals by instilling in the human mind the belief that we can do wrong and have the same repaired by another through the profession of a belief—the fundamental doctrine of Christianity, that of the atonement. Bro Myrick makes no mention of these terrible untruths when he gives his own definition of religion.

Spiritualism has suffered deeply in many ways at the hands of those in whose keeping it has been placed. The pride of wisdom that ofttimes accompanies its possession, delights in it as a philosophy; and in its intellectual coldness would insist that it is all head and no heart; that emotionalism belongs to the old-time revival, and should be rigorously excluded from it. Thus the enthusiasm always necessary for the propagation of a new truth is wanting, and while the latter halts, error sweeps the land.

It is too true that much has been done on our rostrum that belongs with the secularist—a work of destruction of the old; while ours was and is the construction of the new. Where we should have been cultivating love and respect, we have been kindling suspicion and hate. The ill will of the Christian world we must expect, even with our best and wisest endeavor; but we should do nothing to increase it. As their foundation was in God and the future life, our demonstration of the latter proved their entire ignorance concerning it, and as this also threw not a single ray of light on the former, of that too it was prover that they were entirely ignorant. But with this demonstration in our own hands, can we afford to be less than very kind to these worshipers of ancient untruths?

With such great leaders as Davis, Tuttle and others in the early history of Spiritualism, we have the key to the best methods of spreading the light. This consists in individualizing it as a religion on its own original lines. We should build anew in place of absorbing the old. With the coming into our possession of the greatest discovery of the nineteenth century, we should lay our foundations with such care as to compel the respect of those who oppose us. To this end we have no use for names and terms, all of whose associations suggest that which we know to be untrue. Our leaders should not assume the name of pastors. Our greatest and holiest days are not Christmas and Easter. Our ceremonies need not be called ordinations and christenings.

If we accept the fact that the demonstration of a continued life appeals to the heart as well as the head, the subject of music becomes an important factor in the work. This must be more than a recognition of the sweet bye and bye and the ethics of being good and doing good. As this demonstration is more than all else, the phenomena and communication in varied form should be the subjects presented in words. The cause will live a new life if the time ever comes when instead of praise, Spiritualism shall be taught in its songs. In the music, the best that the most gifted have created should be ours. Its construction should be made on the principle of Dempster's melody to "Longfellow's Rainy Day"—without which adaptation there can be no inspiration.

Will Spiritualism absorb the church, or will it be absorbed? It is for us to determine. Every concession we make in the interest of Grundy, Unitarianism, or half-fare rates, is a nail in its coffin, and every effort made to individualize it as a religious cult, will compel the respect of those who fear it and who, impelled by selfish or cowardly interest, desire its downfall.

A VISION OF STORM.

"I had a vision of a storm at night—
A monster myriad-mouthed—I saw the sea,
That soared and roared with demoniac glee,
Drag down great ships, and drown men (woeful sight!)
I saw on land homes wrecked with fearful might
Of winds and floods; I saw beneath a tree
A good man slain by lightning, that left free
Another who in evil did delight.
"And then I saw, as though, indeed, above
Hell's hand were there to wield the lightning's rod,
A child struck blind before its mother's eyes;
And that poor mother's grief, her moans and cries,
More than a good man's words denying God,
Disproved, if God there be, that God is love!"

POWER OF HABITS.

Their Wonderful Influence IN MOLDING THE SPIRIT.

:o:

Shakspeare was right when he said, "Use doth breed a habit in a man." This is just as true of mental and spiritual exercises as of physical. We first make our habits, then the product of our manufacture becomes our tyrant. Habits that we have made make us.

Habit is like a cable. We weave the threads of it until it becomes so strong that we who made it cannot break it. Its links or strands are generally too small to be felt until they are too strong to be broken.

The influence of habit constitutes the deepest law of human nature. It has its blessings and its dangers, like everything of power. It is either the best of servants, or it can easily become the worst of masters. John Foster, in his wonderful essay on "Decision of Character" (which every young man and young woman would do well to read) says most forcibly: "In a majority of things habit is a greater plague than ever afflicted Egypt. In religious character it is a grand fallacy."

Habits are to the soul what veins and arteries are to the blood, the courses in which it moves. A large part of Christian virtue consists in good habits. On the other hand, if we would know who is the most degraded, the wretchedest of human beings, look for the man who has practiced vice so long that he clings to it while he curses it; it pursues him while he dreads it; he is impelled to it by what has been allowed to become a law of his nature, reaching after it, yearning for it, and knowing all the while that it will gnaw out his heart and make him roll in the dust and bite the earth in anger.

Habits are the petrifaction of feelings. They work more constantly and with greater force than reason, which, you know, when we have most need of it, is seldom fairly consulted, and more rarely obeyed. This is what makes it so hard to convert old men. Their habits are so fixed as to prevent their reforming. "What they will they cannot."

There is one feature in the law of habit which is so psychologically certain, so uniformly sure in its operation, and in some of its consequences so almost fearful, that it deserves to be remembered by all, and is especially commended to the consideration of the young. Good habits to be used in this life have to be formed early. The character that is to be used in eternity has to be formed in time. Habits do much, do most to form it—good habits molding a good character, and bad habits a bad character. Our power of passive sensation is weakened by the repetition of impressions, and just as certainly our active propensities are strengthened by the repetition of actions.

We all know how difficult it is to get rid of a habit, especially of an evil habit. Take profanity, for example. I do not suppose anybody over ten years old will argue in its favor, think it smart, brave or manly. Most men who swear admit it is a weakness. Continued cursing impairs the force of speech. A man forever taking oaths on his lips resorts to exaggeration, and finally people divide what he says by two in order to get the truth. But let the swearer try to discontinue the habit. Even the grace of God cannot stop him in an instant. Much endeavor and some humiliation are necessary to break the vile habit.

Or take gambling. I have known gamblers. I know how that vice petrifies all the finer feelings, and substitutes a genteel exterior for interior refinement. No passion leads men to such fearful extremities. None so destroys them, body, soul and spirit. None produces such monsters, such insincere men, such cold-blooded hypocrites. It requires more than a miracle of grace to convert a gambler. The habit once fixed, the destiny is as good as determined, we say.

Or take the drink habit. What chains that binds about the strongest men! It puts a hook in the nose of our very best at will. I have seen men able to face a cannon shiver like a reed before the temptation to drink, acknowledge they had not sufficient will power to pass by the door of a saloon and not enter.

And then there are other habits, not the great vices, but the little habits which mean so much for good or ill through life—procrastination, selfish ease, bullying manners and various infringements of others' rights—the common, unlovely "traits of character" which in the home, the office, the store, affect those about us as well as ourselves.

It is well for us to study our habits, and, since they have such a hold upon us for good or for evil, to break off bad ones before they develop, and to establish the good ones in the orderly course of living. It is surprising what a hold habit gets on nature. I know men of shrewd sense and sound judgment—successful men in business—who, having become habituated to constant tobacco smoking, when told by their physicians they will die if they continue such excessive use, deliberately say, facing all the consequences of a family made fatherless and a useful life cut short in its career: "I can't help it; I can't stop." Isn't that a sad commentary on the weakness of human nature?

Young people, cultivate for yourselves, and help your brothers and sisters to cultivate good habits. Let not your virtues be spasmodic. Settle somewhat the course of your life while you are young and plastic. In middle life, one's habits, like his joints, become set. "It's hard to teach an old dog new tricks."

Make it your habit to take exercise and be moderate in your eating and drinking, that your bodies may be strong.

Make it your habit to read and study a little every day, and only those things worth the time spent upon them, in order that your minds may be kept wholesome and ready for any stress which emergency may put upon them.

Make it your habit to attend to the development of your spiritual life. Pray if never so briefly, never so fraternally, night and morning. Direct your thoughts upward, far above earth, and beyond the skies, that your soul may not be dwarfed through your neglect to nurture it.

Study your habits. They are your life. All habits are worthy of attention, little ones perhaps worthy of most attention, lest they grow into great ones and of the wrong kind.

Look out for favorite habits. Those you love most may do you most harm. Strong Samson was betrayed to death by his beloved Delilah. The devil always attacks our weakest side. Great Anthony in the arms of Cleopatra, and a hundred instances in our own day show us how the strongest are weak at some point.

"That which is to be, hath already been," but let us strive to prevent the converse being true: "that which hath already been is to be"—if it is harmful to our best interests, and of all bad habits, perhaps, procrastination is the worst of all, being the most "easily besetting sin." For it keeps us continually putting off from day to day the start on the right road; it prevents that "Right about, face," which must be definitely and resolutely taken before the "Forward, march," in the right direction.

The "well done" hereafter will be said only to those who have "well done" here. He who would be a great soul in the future must begin to be a great soul now.

The above by Rev. George R. Van De Water, contains a divine lesson that Spiritualists should consider. The spirit is simply the ultimate of habits whether good or bad, and they alone determine its future destiny in the eternal world; determine whether the conditions there that surround it shall be bright and glorious, or dark and dreary.

HIS SHIP GUIDED

By a Supernatural Visitor. ONE OF COLUMBUS' CREW.

:o:

Sailing Around the World. By Capt. Joshua Slocum. The Century Co.

This is an account, as set forth by The Nation, of one of the most remarkable and successful nautical enterprises ever attempted, whose claim to pre-eminence resides in the fact that it involved a cruise of 46,000 miles on all of the oceans, in a sloop thirty-six feet, nine inches in length over all, and of nine tons net burden, sailed by one solitary man. This exploit was accomplished, not in the interests of trade or for the sake of gain, but seemingly from a spirit of adventure and of spontaneous love of the water. That Capt. Slocum was not inspired by sordid impulse was a source of ceaseless wonder at the various ports at which he touched—except at Samoa, the only place that he visited where he never heard allusion made to what "would or would not pay." Many successful conflicts have been waged with the sea in craft of small dimensions—in them explorers and shipwrecked mariners have made long and perilous voyages; but never before has a single man embarked with such calm deliberation in so diminutive a vessel to circumnavigate the globe, and carried the venture to a successful conclusion.

It is not to be expected that the average reader, unacquainted with nautical vicissitudes, will be able to gauge in all of its dimensions the extraordinary exploint of Capt. Slocum; but in those who have seen the ocean in all its moods from the decks of sailing craft, or who have passed all their days at the edge of the heaving sea, or who have sailed small boats in dangerous waters at all times and at all seasons, it will arouse sentiments of unqualified admiration and respect for him as a valiant and resourceful man. It is from this point of view that the author's simple and unpretentious narrative of his cruise must be judged. Absence of literary finish and florid word-painting sinks into insignificance compared with the overwhelming impression his story conveys of dominant courage and placid self-reliance.

The rig of the sloop is the most unsuited for navigating the open sea. It is heavy, cumbersome, and dangerous there, even when handled with a crew numerous and able. Yet it was in such a craft, alone and unaided, that Capt. Slocum sailed from Boston to Gibraltar, thence across the South Atlantic to Brazil and the Straits of Magellan, where he changed the rig into that of a yawl—an ideal one for cruising in small vessels. His skill as the skipper of a sloop was all the more remarkable inasmuch as his nautical training had been acquired in square-rigged craft. This emphasizes the extraordinary quality of his seamanship. As a navigator, he was no less surprising. Provided with a cheap tin clock in lieu of a chronometer, he was rarely at fault in his longitude. When he expected to make a port, the bowsprit of the Spray was pointed directly at its entrance, when it was sighted, even after a forty-day run at sea. Naval officers, with all their scientific training and elaborate navigating tools, cannot always attain to this accuracy.

The original of the Spray was a fishing boat, supposed to be a hundred years old. When it came into the possession of Capt. Slocum, it was hauled up in a pasture lot in process of decay. Without assistance he rebuilt the craft upon the original lines. That he did the work thoroughly the record of the voyage reveals. Moreover, the sail-plan was well balanced; for, with the helm lashed, he sailed long stretches without touching the wheel. When the Spray was altered into a yawl, it did still better, for on one occasoin it sailed on one course for twenty-two days, without his being at the wheel for more than an hour and a half during the entire period.

On April 24, 1895, Captain Slocum sailed from Boston, stopping at various coastwise ports until he reached Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, whence, on the 2nd of July, he took his final departure from the American coast, bound for the Azores, his first port to call, where he arrived July 20. On July 26, the day after leaving the Azores, occurred the most dramatic incident of the voyage. Some of his friends on shore had presented him with a quantity of plums and a native cheese. He ate freely of both. The amalgam was not a harmonious one, for it brought on a dreadful attack of stomachic cramps. Before the Captain was completely disabled, a blow came on. He should have hove to; instead, he doubled-reefed the mainsail and, with a full jib, put the Spray on her course, lashed the wheel, and went below to roll in agony of pain on the cabin floor. While delirious from the disorder, he imagined that he saw through the companion-way a tall man at the helm, who doffed his hat and said to him, "I am one of Columbus crew. I am the pilot of the Pinto come to aid you. Lie quiet, Senor Captain, and I will guide your ship to-night. You have a calentura; but you will be all right to-morrow." When the Captain recovered his full senses, it was broad day. The Spray was still going like a race horse. The sloop had made ninety miles in the night through a rough sea with no one at the helm—except the supernatural visitor.

A QUESTION.

Where's the Infinite Intelligence IN THE FAMINE IN INDIA?

:o:

According to the daily papers the report that cholera is strengthening its deadly hold on famine-stricken India brings the pitiful condition of that country more than ever to public view. About 93,500,000 persons, for this is the population of the districts affected, are sweltering their squalid existences away in pestilence and misery that show no signs of abating. Hundreds of thousands of pounds in good British gold, good German marks and American corn have been thrown into the country, but, judging from the latest advices, all this charity is merely a drop in the ocean.

The famine and its attendant complications appear to exceed in virulence any two previous visitations. The viceroy, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, and the government are making ceaseless exertions to meet the terrible emergency, but the stupendous difficulties confronting them prevent the present supplying of relief to more than 5,000,000.

In the meantime the native states are dotted with heaps of dead and dying and the roads are crowded with ghastly bands seeking to escape from the stricken territory, but who for lack of food and water mostly succumb in the attempt. One of the most hopeless features of the whole affair is contained in the statement of a special correspondent at Simla, who writes:

"Ten times the total relief could be laid out in a single district without fully relieving its distress. All we can hope for is a succession of good years to put the people on their legs again."

The British districts are reported to be so far escaping the large starvation and mortality that mark the native states. But that their condition is not enviable is evident from the following description sent by a Bombay correspondent of the scene at Ahmedabab, a city in the presidency of Bombay.

"In an open space upward of 200 were seated, old and young, being famine personified. The smell arising from their filthy rags was sickening and had attracted myriads of flies.

"Some, especially the old men, were bony framework. A girl suckling two children was ghastly to look at, but the little ones, with hollow temples, sunken eyes and cheeks and the napes of their necks falling in under their skulls, which seemed to overbalance their emaciated bodies, and with wisplike arms and legs, were more dreadful still. Many were suffering from disease and numbers had the fever. Those who could work were sent on where tanks were being dug. Others were given a meal and passed on to the poorhouse."

This picture is from a less seriously affected part of the country. The sufferings in the remoter districts, where the famine is worse, where all the cattle have long since died, where the water is precious and where cholera has now added its dread scourge can well be imagined.

A special dispatch from Bombay says cholera is alarmingly virulent among the natives on the famine relief works at Viramagon, where there are fifty deaths daily from the disease.

Thomas L. Johnson, ministerial delegate from Bombay, says: "Bombay Presidency is under the rule of a Governor appointed by the Queen, subject, of course, to the supreme authority of the Viceroy, who is also appointed by the crown. It is the smallest of the four Presidencies, but one of the most important on account of its territorial position. Bombay City is its capital, and the chief emporium of the coast. The district is included in the famine area, and is just now undergoing one of the most unfortunate experiences ever known in the way of famine and plague. For the relief of those suffering from lack of food the government pays about two cents a day for each of the 4,000,000 supported. Private benevolence is doing much in relieving the distress of the people, which is scarcely lessened by the relief measures of the government. Much has to be done yet to make the relief measures thoroughly effective, and to prevent wholesale starvation all over India."

Rockwell Clanoy, Presiding Elder of Allahabad District, Northwest India Conference, says:

"The population of northern India is 50,000,000, 80 per cent of whom are cultivators of the soil. The masses are exceedingly poor. They live in villages, in mud huts, with roofs of bamboo and and tile or thatch. Fields surround these villages, and during the greater part of the year men, women, and children spend most of their time at work in the fields. Most of the land is held by native landlords, who rent it to the villagers in small lots, which are not large enough to support the holders. The people eke out a living by working for the landlords, and are paid daily in grain. When the harvests are good the common people can secure enough coarse food to give them one meal a day. In 1897 and 1890 the monsoon failed, causing widespread failure of the harvests and famine, which involves, not only northern India, but also Rajiputana, central and western India, the central provinces, Bombay Presidency, and other districts. More than 60,000,000 are famine-stricken, and nearly 6,000,000 are being supported by the Indian government. The famine must continue to grow worse every day until the next harvest in October. The Indian government and the missionaries are doing all in their power to save the lives of the millions of starving men, women and children, and we sincerely hope that the Christian Americans will help us in this work of charity."

Starvation in India, and yet a God! Dying there by the millions, and yet the crops are withheld by an Infinite Intelligence! Prayers avail absolutely nothing! The groans of the dying go forth in one agonizing wail to an all-wise God, and yet they meet with nothing but a mocking response! The sun rises and sets on scenes of starvation that beggar description, and yet not a drop of rain falls to give hope to the wretched people. Under the circumstances finely spun theories on the existence of a Divine Ruler of the Universe, who counts the hairs of each head, and notices each sparrow that falls to the ground, do not afford the least satisfaction to the one who is constantly surveying the scenes of misery in India.

CRIME INCREASING,

Though Spiritualism Exists. SAD FOR THE 20TH CENTURY.

:o:

New Thoughts on Criminology.

The most advanced views concerning crime and criminals which have ever found utterance in San Francisco [as set forth in the San Francisco (Cal.) Chronicle], and which stand abreast of the world's most progressive thought, were recently presented by Dr. A. M. Gardner, in one of the lectures of the Lane course at Cooper Medical College. His statements and conclusions demand the serious regard of thinking men and women who have the welfare of the human race at heart, and the corrective measures which he suggests, one of which bears the brand of undoubted originality, merit something more than passing attention.

Dr. Gardner's discussion of the subject concerned itself chiefly with the growth of crime and its origin or conducive causes, as determined by the foremost criminologists of the day; with the corrective measures already applied, their failures and their successes and, lastly, with a radical suggestion of his own which he believed worthy of trial in this country. He found all statisticians agreed that crime and criminals are increasing in every civilized country at an appalling rate, out of all proportion to the increase in population. These same figures, prepared by governmental employes for the most part, strictly impartial and unbiased, compel the conclusion that at least 50 per cent of crime is to be traced directly to the influence of drink. Without any affectation of giving a temperance argument the lecturer quoted in this connection some impressive figures. He found that the tax on strong drink, annually levied in England, amounts to $140, 486, 400, leaving one to compute what the actual amount expended by the consumer must be. The half-million people in Boston, generally accepted as the model American city, spend $6,875,000 annually for drink, a sum exceeding all that is expended in the support of schools, the police department and for the maintenance of public pleasure grounds combined. Statistics of the state of Massachusetts, covering a term of twenty years, show a record of 578,348 sentences for crime, 540,314 being for drunkenness, giving some faint indication of the cost of the vice to the community, aside from the maintenance of crowds of vagabonds in workhouses and poorhouses. Every year the people of this country pay out $700,000,000 for drink, and 365,000 men are annually arrested for drunkenness. The vice of inebriety would be bad enough upon this showing alone, but its curse is transmitted to new generations, until the blood of these dissolute and criminal families "underruns society like devil grass."

Intemperance, heredity, environment, these are the three important factors in the production of the criminal. Given the crime and its perpetrator, what methods has society employed in the past for their suppression and correction? What is it doing at present?

The criminal laws and prisons of the past, founded solely on the principle of retribution, Dr. Gardner passed with little comment, merely remarking it is not so very far in the past, when within half a century a nine-year-old child was put to death in England for stealing two pence worth of paint. Retributive crimes and laws were founded on the theory that every criminal was a normal human being, which he is not. To-day the fact is generally recognized that every truly criminal act proceeds from a person either temporarily or permanently in a morbid condition, and the new theory of the control and treatment of the criminal, who has become by his act an anti-social being, is based upon this view. The judicial taking of human life as a penalty for murder offers no compensation to society, and if it is not deterrent of crime has no justification. There have been many improvements in prisons themselves, although this country and England might learn the valuable lessons from two of the weakest nations on the globe. In the Spanish city of Cueta, in Morocco, there exists a prison colony which is a model for the world. The convicts, guilty of all manner of crime, are permitted to freely mingle with the community and to take service with the families. The coachman who drives your carriage is a convict. The man who cooks your food and waits upon you at table is a convict. They are treated with trust and consideration on every hand and given every opportunity to retrieve their records, and as a consequence, in this city, peopled with a small army of thieves and murderers, thievery and capital crimes are unknown. In the city of Tokio, the capital of Japan, there is another prison, a cheery, attractive place, a model of cleanliness. Here exquisite cloisonne ware is made by convicts. Those who are incapable of executing the more artistic processes take up simpler forms of artisanship. Only twenty-nine, out of the 2,000, who have shown themselves incapable of skilled labor, are set to breaking stone. No form of punishment is known in any prison except confinement in a single-celled dark cage, and so obedient and well behaved is this small army of men, that the dark cage is not used for months at a time. Looking upon this peaceful, cleanly and attractive industrial hive, a recent visitor declared that "the recollection of the City Prison of San Francisco came over him like a nausea."

The Elmira Reformatory in New York seems to be the only penal institution in this country which is addressing itself intelligently, kindly and successfully, to the solution of the problem of criminal reclamation. Here the indeterminate sentence is in operation. Men are kept so closely at work at trades that they have no time to brood over the past or to plan new evil. When they have been in the institution long enough to indicate their desire to lead good lives they are released on parole, but are kept under close inspection until the day arrives when a continuous good record wins for them the State's full pardon, and they are restored to the full privileges of citizenship. This system Dr. Gardner contrasted with the results following the definite and determinate sentence, which offers no incentive to reform and usually brings out the worst there is in a man, confirming him in a criminal career. Drunkenness, as the most powerful disposing influence to crime, he proposes shall be treated upon the same plan. He would not wait for a man to commit a crime under the influence of liquor before making him a public charge, but whenever a man shows himself a slave to drink he would place him in a state institution with an indefinite sentence, permitting him to leave only on parole, and compelling him to show he has mastered the habit before awarding him a final discharge. The funds necessary for the support of such reformatories he would secure by taxation levied upon the sale of liquor. In this way he would not only arrest an evil harmful in itself, but would prevent the birth of the weak-minded, insane or imbecile progeny of drunken fathers and mothers.

The above conveys to Spiritualists everywhere an important lesson which they should file away for future reference and consideration. Crime increasing! How long can that go on before there will be written over the portals of our republic, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin"—"thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." Look at it in whatever light you may, Spiritualists, and the outlook is a sad one. Fifty years or more ago there was one in our penitentiaries and jails to every 5,000 inhabitants. Now there is one to every 750 inhabitants. Here is food for reflection for spirits as well as mortals. There is no way in getting around the facts; they are stubborn things. You must face them. They constitute a grave problem for the scientist to solve. We live in a so-called age of enlightenment, yet contemplate the figures in regard to crime. They are appalling!

Mrs. Hanaford is a noted woman in the east and a fine preacher. Her ideas of the next life are becoming widespread. She says that she is a believer in that which she believes St. Paul teaches when he says "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body * * * and as we have borne the image of the earth, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." (I. Cor., xv., 44, 49.)

As a Universalist minister she believes and preaches the doctrine of immortality, the resurrection of the spiritual body from the lifeless natural body, the assured hope of the everlasting love of God for all His children—and hence she believes—

"There is no death, what seems so is transition,
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portals we call death."

She goes on to say that if there is no death, then there is no diminution of affection for the dear ones left behind by those who pass into the beyond, and if that love continues, there must be a desire on the part of the departed ones to communicate with those still abiding in the flesh. It may be by impressions on the mind, it may be by the imaginings of the day or the dreams of the night, somehow or some way there is, she believes a mental or physical communication between the loved and loving ones parted by death. Psychic force is a scientific fact.

She has witnessed some of the phenomena of Spiritualism with great interest and some satisfaction, though she has more often been disappointed than gratified at the results of her efforts to learn about departed friends.

Thirty-six years ago she was invited by the mother of the then editor of the Boston Journal to accompany her to the Boston office of the noted medium, Charles Foster. She stipulated that the medium should not know her name or anything about her. Her friend desired her to write three questions on tiny slips of paper and roll them in a way to keep the queries from the medium's sight. She did so, and placed one in his hand. She was seated at a table, one side of which was against the wall. He held the little roll in his hand a moment quietly, then said: "Arthur is with Margaret, and he tells me to give you this word of encouragement." Thereupon followed words of tender advice and hopefulness, saying a career was before her, and she was to enter upon it soon, and be an active worker in a field of labor of which she did not dream. Then the medium said: "Open the paper and read your question." She had written, "Is Arthur with Margaret?" She had reference to her reverend and beloved friend, Chaplain Arthur B. Fuller, whose death at Fredericksburg had then occurred. She had asked him if he was with his sister, the celebrated Margaret Fuller Ossoli. This was in 1864. In 1868 she was ordained, having been led by what she regarded as providential steps into the ministry of the Universalist church. Thus there seemed to be a fulfillment of the words which purported to come from the spirit land.

When Mr. Foster took up the second paper he said: "Joseph is with you. He is one of your guardians. And here is another." At this point Mr. Foster broke off suddenly and acted as if some one had touched him on the shoulder and forbidden the utterance of the sentence already begun. Then he went on to speak brotherly words as if from the guardian he had mentioned. Closing, he handed her the paper. On it she had written, "Where is Joseph?" referring to her brother who had died nineteen years before. Without handing her the third paper, which he tossed carelessly into the grate, he said: "Oh, you'll find them very soon." She had written, "Where are my journals?" In April she did find them in a wholly unexpected place.

In April, also, she received news of the drowning of her youngest brother in the far Pacific. The intelligence did not reach America till April, though the death occurred in December. But in February he was already in the spirit land, and when Mr. Foster said, "And there's another," he was about to tell her that another brother was with Joseph? She has often thought he was hindered, because by his not mentioning the fact, she was spared the sorrow of bereavement a few weeks longer. At that time her sister was very ill, and the saying (however doubted) would have greatly distressed her. That has seemed to Mrs. Hanaford to be the reason for the sudden withholding of the rest of the broken sentence. It will be easily perceived that she writes as if she believed in communication with departed friends. She confesses that these facts which she has mentioned greatly impressed her, and as personal experience they did help to convince her that life is continuous, and that there may be communication with the spirit land.

It is not impossible. "The Bible," as Rev. Dr. Sears once said, "is a continual angel-orphany from Genesis to Revelation," and she sees no reason why those who have been saints on earth may not be angels in heaven, and henceforth "ministering spirits" also to the loved ones not yet summoned to the Master's presence. Death is but an incident in the ever-continuous life of God's child:

"Death is but the close of life's alarms,
The watch light on the shore—
The clasping in immortal arms
Of loved ones gone before.

BRAIN VIBRATIONS

By Which the Soul Recognizes THE EXTERNAL WORLD.

:o:

As said by a writer on the "Curiosities of Lunacy," "There are cases where blows on the head have benefited the brain, and produced extraordinary changes for the better. Mabillon was almost an idiot till, at the age of twenty-six, he fell down a stone staircase, fractured his skull, and was trepanned. From that moment he became a genius. Doctor Prichard mentions a case of three brothers who were nearly all idiots. One of them was injured on the head, and from that time he brightened up, and made a successful barrister. Wallenstein, too, they say, was a mere fool till he fell out of a window, and awoke with enlarged capabilities. A patient in an asylum was the victim of many delusions. He was paying off the national debt, going into partnership with Baron Rothschild, and forming a lodge of female Freemasons. One day an epileptic patient, irritated at being perpetually asked to buy imaginary shares, gave him a tremendous blow on the bridge of the nose. From that time he improved rapidly, and acknowledged that the blow had had a sobering effect, and had quite knocked the nonsense out of him. There is no doubt that this was the secret of that cruel old remedy for madness, the circulating swing, mentioned favorably by physicians of the last century. This horrible swing was a small box fixed upon a pivot, and worked by a windlass. The "inflexible" maniac, or the maniac expecting a paroxysm, was firmly strapped in a sitting or recumbent posture. The box was then whirled round at the average velocity of a hundred revolutions a minute, and its beneficial effect was supposed to be heightened by reversing the motion every six or eight minutes, and by stopping it occasionally with a sudden jerk. The results of this swing (which occasionally brought on concussion of the brain) were profound and protracted sleep, intense perspiration, mental exhaustion, and a not unnatural horror of any recurrence to the same remedy, which left a moral impression that acted as a permanent restraint. That the results were often beneficial we have indisputable evidence. The cases of suspended consciousness after brain injury are well worthy attention. A man who awakes out of sleep is conscious of a lapse of time, and can generally even guess its duration; but the man struck on the brain is often unconscious of any lapse. A man was struck in the street, and was afterward delirious. He was unconscious after the blow for fourteen days. He was then delirious and maniacal for ten weeks. When he became more tranquil they brought him to the asylum in a strait waistcoat. He soon recovered, but when he became conscious he had clean forgotten the fourteen days' trance, and the ten weeks' delirium and mania. At the battle of the Nile an English captain was struck on the head by a shot, and became unconscious. He was taken home with the wounded, and remained in Greenwich Hospital fifteen months deprived of sense and speech. At the end of that period an operation was performed, and the brain relieved from the pressure. He instantly arose from his bed, and continued the orders to the sailors which had been so abruptly interrupted fifteen months before. Dr. Abercrombie gives an analogous case. A lady was struck with apoplexy while sitting at the whist table. It was Thursday evening when she fell, and she lay in a stupor all Friday and Saturday. On Sunday she suddenly recovered her consciousness; and her first words were, 'What are trumps?' The clockwork had stopped at that point, and now the pendulum again commenced to swing."

The brain, like a musical instrument, requires to be in tune in order to give expression in an orderly manner to ideas. Sometimes its normal vibrations are interrupted by the pressure of the skull; sometimes there is a spontaneous action on its part, entirely different from those vibrations that are caused by the senses taking cognizance of the external world. When one is intoxicated, the brain cells vibrate disorderly, and as a consequence the thoughts are incoherent, the mind cannot weigh accurately ideas, and subjective visions are formed that are truly appalling. When a person is suffering from what is termed delirium tremens, the vibrations of the brain cells are so discordant that the most hideous visions are formed spontaneously, and the results, though subjective, are none the less real. The brain being the seat of consciousness, a pressure thereon changes at once its normal vibrations, and disastrous result follows. A blow on the head with a club restored a man in this State who was violently insane, to his normal condition. It removed luckily the pressure of the skull at a particular spot, and restored the brain's normal condition.

The brain being the seat of consciousness, and consciousness depending on vibrations for its existence, a portion of the brain can sometimes be removed without in any degree affecting the mind; but if in the course of the operations its vibrations should in any way be modified or changed, the entire nature of the individual will be changed. A blow on the head resulting in a fracture of the skull and the subsequent removal of a small portion of the brain, changed the entire nature of a Norwegian from a genial, kind, ever indulgent husband and father, to a tyrannical old scold. All this resulted from the surgical operation changing the vibrations of the brain making an entirely different individual of the man. The study of the human brain reveals many singular things. The pineal gland was long supposed to be the seat of the soul, from the fact that physiology could see no earthly use for its existence besides that. One prominent Spiritualist located the soul there. But later discoveries show that he was about a million of miles from the exact truth. The pineal gland was probably a sense-organ of pre-tertiary period—an eye—and though since its functions in that respect have ceased its rudiments still exist in every human brain. Consciousness is no less the result of vibration, than hearing, feeling and seeing.

LIFE AND DEATH

Illustrated by Miss I. A. Safford. DEATH IS TRIUMPHANT.

:o:

After all, when it comes to death, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, who of us is quite capable of seeing life whole. Some of our statistical writers have recently been handling that "eternal mystery" in a way to demolish all the unities of life and put us back to some dark age conception of being, where some stern Rhadamanthan chops off our heads, without law, purpose, or ceremony and leaves us—what remains of us—to go our darkling way with only the hope wrapped up in the eternity of force to encourage us that it shall not be a short cut to annihilation.

"And Enoch was not, for God took him." Measure the distance if you can between that conception of death and immortality and the former one. Or, if Enoch, with his mystic walk into paradise is too much for you, apply even Stevenson's faith in the "ultimate decency of things" to the problem of life and see if an event that comes about in the ordinary process of nature and is universal in its application, should be held a calamity, a dark untried "sentence" against the children of men. Long ago Schiller declared "what is so universal as death must be a benefit." but far beyond that greater ones than Schiller has shown us that it is a law of love. Over the gate of hell, Dantes places this inscription:

Justice, the founder of my fabric moods,
To rear me won the task of power divine,
Supremest wisdom, and primeval love.

And when, through disobedience, man "let sin into the world and all our woes" it was a pitying angel who turned him back from the tree of life, "lest he eat and live forever" in his sorrows. Puzzle out the mystery as you will. Count that a stupendous scheme to create a race of beings greater than the angels, in the greatness of conscience, goodness and power of choice, had gone wrong, and found the creature unequal to it, or claim that from some sleeping seed through evolutionary law life's chain had reached the human creature not yet established in self-sustaining glory and perfection. In any case the need of change and betterment was there and through whatever gates of death or hell the Lord of life led on the process it were better, aye kindlier, than to leave it in its sorry imperfections.

In one of Dickens' under tales he pictures an old woman, withered and infirm, sitting by the grave of her lover and crooning the tale of her love to a fair young child who finds her there. The child eyes her curiously, unable to connect the sweet romance of love with such a face and form, and then she asks timidly if her lover was an old man. At that the woman draws from her bosom a worn locket and turns to the child the picture of a young Apollo, radiant in all the first glow of youth, and facing him a maiden of some eighteen summers, fresh, blooming and as fair as an artist's dream. "There we are, dear," she says softly; "would you take that smiling girl for the old woman at your side." And when the tell-tale eyes of childhood answer her in horror, she murmurs bitterly, "No, no, there is not a trace of the girl he loved left in me. if he saw me at the grave he would never know me. And he is young as ever." Oh, it is life that changes us past love and knowledge—not death, not death!

It is a grewsome tale, but it points a deep truth and that is that a life that holds the seeds of deformity and decay within it is a fearful thing, and death is the only justice of the gods to creatures of such estate. To leave man to any life of weakness and decay, any imperfect phase or crisis, would be the thing for which he might well arraign his Maker, not for letting him out of it by any procedure that his higher wisdom found necessary. That death is such a process—the final step in that road that leads to fuller life is so clearly the teaching of both science and religion—to any one who will not confront that second or moral death of the Bible with the physical change which Christ plainly said was not death but sleeping—that one marvels to find any intelligent person, to say nothing of scholars and thinkers, treating it otherwise. That man has made it the extremest penalty for crime, as recently noticed, is nothing to the point—unless to emphasize his bungling conceptions of it, and the wide difference between the ends and ways of human law and the Divine. When man comes to understand the remedial and developing ends of nature's methods, perhaps he will handle this death penalty a little differently. At any rate, he has not arrived at such judicious action in the case as to make his use of it a criterion for judging the Almighty's. Besides, if he had any decent human principle in the matter, it should not be to punish, but to protect that he resorts to such extremity, and this can by no means be applied to the natural law which, if uninterfered with, would claim but the ripest and the best from human harvests. "He giveth his beloved sleep." How much is there in the nature of a criminal sentence in that soft whisper. The truth is that, by every discernible law of life, death is so logically an event or link in the eternal chain of being that no theology could stand that regarded it from any other standpoint, and thus it has grown with the old superstitions that surrounded it with the terrors of judgment and wrath and fiery sentence. That it but leads on, in orderly connection, to the life beyond, is the only rational view to take of it, and it has been well said that "had not Divine interference designed to raise the dead, nature herself is in the act to do it." After what manner they are raised up and with what body they come is another question with which perhaps the individual himself has more to do than all the death angels that were ever invented. It is enough that these angels should be recognized at last as but servants to help man on to the best that is within him to bestow that may be, and the life he has prepared for himself. And thus it is that all the better thought of to-day has come to regard them. Death "comes to set thee free, O, greet him cheerily," is the tone of the modern poet, and art gives us now for death's heads and ghastly reapers, angels of strength and tenderness bearing, as in Elihu Vedder's picture, the fainting soul over the surging river.

"I tell thee his face is fair," sings Paul Hamilton Hayne, in his dying song,

As the morn-bows amber sings,
And the gleam in his unbound hair
Like the flash of a thousand springs.

All that life failed in, all that love denied, all that sorrow silenced or the grave hid, he promises to restore in full and fadeless glory.

To be worthy of death is about the only legitimate concern, then, that man can have in connection with it, and so great is death that the utmost greatness of his soul can not more than fit him to face it worthily. And here again nature comes in with her disciplinary work, and, in her last wrestle with man, compels him to be great,

So when the angel of the darker drink
Himself shall find you by the river's brink,
And offering his cup invite your soul
Forth to your lips to quaff—you shall not shrink.

That is nature's lesson, and somehow the timidest of her children learn it. But to find out where the secret of good, of joy resides in it, as in life, and, with Stevenson, give it "a voice far beyond singing," belongs only to those who know Stevenson's faith and "are sure that God in the long run means kindness by them." Small kindness would it be to leave man with all his deep dreams unrealized in the pit of the grave, or swept by elemental changes into plant or clod. 'Tis the life of that dreampart of him that the thinking soul demands, and the gentle Jean Paul Richter breathed one of the fairest hopes ever voiced above our poor mortality when he said: "We shall find when we die that we have not lost our dreams, but that we have only lost our sleep."

FIVE YEARS OLD,

And a Most Remarkable Medium. SHE SURPRISED PADEREWSKI.

:o:

"She is the most wonderful child I ever met, and had I not heard her play I would not have believed what I had been told." Such was Ignace Paderewski's remark during his visit to San Francisco, Cal., (and as reported in the Chronicle of that city), apropos of the playing of little Phyllida Ashley a tot of five and a half years, residing with her parents on East Twenty-third street, Oakland.

The remark means more because Paderewski was pestered to death while he was here by the over-ambitious parents of precocious children. There was not an afternoon when the great pianist, tired out from his matinee, was not kept from one to two hours listening to these piano-playing children, until his soul was weary within him. Sometimes the children played at the numbers for which Paderewski is most famous himself, but he was obliged to grind his teeth and endure. He was, however, frank. He warned many of them that they would never be piano players. To others he held out slight hopes, but of Phyllida Ashley he was enthusiastic.

At one of his concerts at the California Theater, Paderewski was told of the little Oakland girl. The great pianist was very skeptical, but, with his usual politeness, he said he would listen. As he named no time or place, Phyllida's friends concluded that Paderewski wanted to hear no more of the child, but in this they were mistaken. On his return from San Jose he expressed a desire to hear the baby play, and one Sunday evening she was brought to him.

Paderewski lifted the child on to the stool and allowed her to use his cherished piano. The child played an air and sang, but this was merely an introduction. The little fingers, with wonderful dexterity and feeling, rendered the Lohengrin "Wedding March," and while she did so Paderewski became intensely interested. He passed from the room and returned with a bonbon, but the little girl declined it very quietly and proceeded with "Der lieben langen Tag."

At its finish the master hugged her and kissed her, and begged her to play something else. Phyllida, all from memory, played "Marching Through Georgia," but this did not interest Paderewski until she rendered it in the minor, when he exclaimed: "Marvelous! What is this?" and again kissed the little player.

The ensuing effort was the rendition of the waltz from Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." Phyllida played this according to the interpretation of Rosenthal and De Pachmann, and when it was over, Paderewski took her in his arms and walked around his salon with her, smothering her with kisses. In answer to his questions he learned that the child had been able to play when 2 years old. "Impossible," said Paderewski; but when he saw a photograph of the infant at the piano taken over three years ago, he accepted the proof, and said that her attitude there showed that she was born to be wedded to a piano.

"Do take good care of the baby," said the great pianist, when the reception ended. "She will be needed, and if you will not give me the picture of that wonderful pose I shall have to steal it. It must go with me."

Phyllida Ashley is the youngest child and only daughter of George and Blanche Sharpe Ashley. She comes from three generations of musicians, her mother being a well-known pianiste and a former pupil of Mrs. John Vance Cheney. Her grandmother was also a professional pianiste and the entire family is musically inclined. These tastes have been born into and bred into the little girl.

Phyllida was named for the charming old English song, "Phyllida Flouts Me," dear to all lovers of ballads. She is a dainty little thing, absolutely devoid of self-consciousness. She has a sweet face, soulful as that of Paloma Schramm, and she is fortunate enough to have wise parents, who will guard her most carefully and avoid, above all things, the "infant-prodigy" precipice. She is not to be sent prematurely on the concert stage to earn a living, but will be carefully nurtured and fostered and educated musically and otherwise. Phyllida Ashley seems to have been born under the auspices and in the environment favorable to the fostering of a great musician.

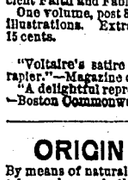
No doubt this little girl is a most remarkable medium, and will finally be acknowledged as such.

A SUBLIME VISION

As Beheld by Col R. G. Ingersoll. PREDICTED A ROSY FUTURE.

:o:

During one of Col. Ingersoll's masterly orations on Decoration Day, a day sacred to every American heart, a vision of the future arose before him. He sees our country filled with happy homes, with firesides of content, the foremost land of all the earth. He sees a world where thrones have crumbled and where the kings are dust. The aristocracy of idleness has perished from the earth. He sees a world without a slave; man at last is free. Nature's forces have by science been enslaved. Lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the secret, subtle powers of earth and air are the tireless toilers for the human race. He sees a world at peace, adorned with every form of art, with music. Myriad voices thrill, while lips are rich with words of love and truth; a world in which no exile sighs, no prisoner mourns; a world on which the gibbet's shadow does not fall; a world where labor reaps its full reward, where work and worth go hand in hand, where the poor girl trying to win bread with the needle—that needle which has been called the asp for the breast of the poor—is not driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, of suicide or shame. He sees a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the lurid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn. He sees a race without disease of flesh or brain, shapely and fair, the married harmony of form and function, and as he looks, life lengthens, joy deepens, love canopies the earth, and over all in the great dome shines the eternal star of Heaven.



Ingersoll's genius was towering; his inspiration as grand and beautiful, as that of any of our poets and seers. While not acknowledging allegiance to the grand truths of Spiritualism he was in close rapport with those master minds in spirit life who are ever on the alert for an opportunity to give expression to some truth that will strike a responsive chord in the hearts of an aspiring people. We do not believe that on the other side of life there was any very great desire manifested to convert Col. Ingersoll to a recognition of the grand truths of Spiritualism. He could do more good in reaching the masses of the people by his poetic eloquence, sublime imagery, and sentiments tremulous with the sweet cadences of music, that characterized his utterances, than he could have done if an avowed Spiritualist. As an orator he was unsurpassed, and his rhythmical sentences fell upon the ear with tender sweetness, leaving a benign influence there which could not fail to do good. His brain vibrations were in harmony with the sphere of poesy, and thoughts dressed in spring-time beauty, summer richness and autumns' golden fruitage, came like evangels unto the mind, and were expressed to a world eager to hear them. We did not desire to proselyte Col. Ingersoll to our cause while he was living; his mission was confined to the liberalizing field, where his heaven-born inspiration found cordial recognition, whereas they would have been regarded as unacceptable if he had uttered them as a Spiritualist. It is a very foolish idea to suppose that in order to be highly inspired one must be a Spiritualist. That does not necessarily follow. Inspiration can not be confined or limited. It is the birthright of every soul honestly aspiring for the truth.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may requre. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Mrs. Donaldson writes: "As I have to write you regarding change of address, I also take the opportunity of telling you how much we appreciate the four books you gave as a premium at the beginning of the year. I am only beginning to develop mediumship, and am very often controlled for reading. I read the whole of The Next World Interviewed at our circle, and every interview was read in a different voice. Many of the controls claimed to be the spirit interviewed, and from the manner in which they were read we could see that was quite possible. When it was the interview of a foreign spirit, the control read in broken English and had all the gestures of a foreigner; this was especially noticeable in the case of George Sand. I do not know if this is a common form of development, but it was a very interesting experience. We like the paper very much and feel greatly interested in the letters from Franz Petersilea. I also read them under control. Another member of circle has begun to take the paper."

Dr. Harriet Edwards, of Chicago, will lecture and give tests Sunday evening at Hibernian Hall, Davenport, Ia. Good music. All are welcome.

The London Times correspondent at Lourence Marques says that President Kruger has been consulting a youthful Dutch seer, who prophesied the restoration of peace by June 14, and the President's death three month's later. The President and the burghers are fully convinced that the predictions are accurate.

Last week we made mention that W. F. Ruffel had been ordained by the Students of Nature as a minister of the Gospel. The one who made the item from the report sent in, did so under a misapprehension of the facts of the case. Miss E. Ebbert, secretary, writes: "Mr. Ruffel was not ordained by S. of N., but was given a certificate as a recognition of being a test medium—not a teacher."

The Banner of Frankfort, Ind., says: "Articles of association have been drafted and are now being circulated for signatures for what is to be known as the 'Frankfort Spiritualist Association.' The articles state that the organization has for its object the investigation and propagation of Spiritualism. It is the purpose of the association to rent a suitable hall, elect a president, treasurer, secretary and three trustees, and to hold meetings at stated periods to be determined hereafter. The members will be requested to pay such assessments to meet the expenses as may be determined upon by the officials. A well-known believer stated to a News reporter that it was the intention to have frequent lectures delivered on the faith, and that meetings or services would be held much after the manner of any other religious organization."

J. A. Gash writes from Ohio: "I have read and reread the six volumes I have received with The Progressive Thinker. I prize them very highly. They are so cheap in price, but well filled with many truths. I am getting quite a nice library of occult science. May you live long to sow the gems of truth, is my heartfelt prayer."

Geo. F. Perkins writes: "I have been busy out of town two Sundays of May, speaking at Elgin and at Englewood. I would like appointments with fair compensation, to lecture, sing and give genuine spirit communications, with philosophic explanation of the laws that govern spirit manifestations. Having had 16 years experience I feel competent to demonstrate the practical utilization of mediumship. Address me at 3558 Cottage Grove avenue, Chicago, Illinois."

Geo. W. Johnson writes from Arkansas: "My wife is a writing medium, the best I have ever met. We have received messages from fifty-one of our friends who have passed to the spirit life. She has only been in the work two years, while I have been a Spiritualist since the year 1850. Now, Mr. Editor, The Progressive Thinker comes to me all right; but I am in the wilderness; wife and I alone in Spiritualism."

Elvar J. Hull writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The East End Society of Spiritualists held the usual services at A. O. U. W. Hall, on Euclid avenue, near Wilson, Sunday evening, the 13th inst., Dr. J. M. Temple, of Washington, D. C., on the platform. After an inspiring invocation by H. C. Andrews, of Indianapolis, Dr. Temple spoke at length on 'The Old and the New,' to a fairly good audience. The beautiful thoughts of the speaker conveyed to his hearers, lead them to realize there is a presence with him not seen by the mortal eye, but seen by many who were endowed with the sixth sense of clear seeing. Dr. Temple followed his lecture with tests, which were fully recognized. H. C. Andrews, the noted improvisator and inspirational speaker, at the close of meeting dismissed the congregation with a benediction inspired by the inimitable Robert Burns. The grand and beautiful words of the speaker, which were uttered with an accent of purest Highland Scotch, but to the unaccustomed ear a feature of uniqueness, but which, nevertheless, was none the less beautiful, and all felt it to be indeed a season spiritually refreshing. Dr. Temple was chosen as delegate to attend the Spiritualists' convention held at Columbus, Ohio, May 22 and 23."

The full name and address of every peson who sends an item for this department, must be given, or otherwise it may not appear. Bear that in mind.

Mrs. Maggie Waite is now at Syracuse, N. Y. Her address there is as follows: 304 South Crouse avenue.

Henrietta Straub writes from Syracuse, N. Y.: "The convention of the New York State Spiritualist Association, held at Syracuse, May 11, 12 and 13, attracted big audiences, and was a consummate success. I do not venture to proffer my individual opinions concerning the merits of the different speakers and mediums; this may be left to veteran judges. One thing, however, allow me to declare: If Spiritualism has many advocates and champions, as able and enthusiastic as those shown forth at said convention, then our cause must prosper, and the world will have to acknowledge ere long, that Spiritualism is the religion of the future."

Wm. Scheth writes from Kansas: "That Lay Sermon in The Progressive Thinker of May 5, gives the best 'declaration of principles,' to my notion, that I have seen yet. Mr. Griffen expresses my views and ideas much better than I could do it myself; and I dare say (take it the world over) that there are ten Spiritualists who will say yea and amen to Brother Griffen's views and ideas on the creed subject to where you will find one Spiritualist that will accept and is satisfied with the creed adopted by the National Spiritualist Association."

Dr. S. D. Bowker writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "Mrs. Mary E. Kratz of Evansville, Ind., spent the month of April with us and did a very excellent work. She was followed by Mrs. Carrie L. Bean and her daughter, Miss Edith Evelin Edwards, both from Lincoln, Neb. With the gifts possessed by these ladies we are greatly blessed, and they are not a whit behind those who laid the foundation of Spiritualism in this city. They are strong in personality and clearness of thought, and remarkable in the large number of fully recognized tests at each service. They will close their service for the society with the end of May, and will be free for any service at Camp-meetings during the summer. Their address is 707 East Ninth street, Kansas City, Mo."

The San Francisco Chronicle says: "Miss Flora MacDonald Shearer, educator and poetess, has again lost her mind, and is occupying a cell in the Detention Hospital for the Insane. During the last three years Miss Shearer has been placed under restraint several times, but each time returning reason brought about her release. Recently the spell of madness again took hold of her. Some malignant spirit was seeking to do her harm, she said, and each night she placed a note and a piece of money under the door mat of her home at 819 Lyon street. The note contained an appeal for mercy, and the money was offered as a bribe. Fearing that her madness might take a dangerous turn, friends of Miss Shearer had her arrested yesterday. Policeman McMurray took her to the Detention Hospital, where she will be kept until her case has been inquired into by the Lunacy Commissioners. The unfortunate poetess is 50 years of age. Twenty-five years of her life were spent in teaching school. She has had several books published, and gained not a little fame for the excellence of her poetry and ethical essays. She is descended from a noted Scotch family, and was named for her grand-mother, Flora MacDonald, the sweetheart of the young Pretender."

W. F. Ruffle of this city writes: "May I intrude upon your space to correct a slight error in reference to myself; and but for the 'dead head' advantages to be gained as with our orthodox friends, I should hope never to be writing on this line. I am, under spirit impression, requested to state that the title of 'Rev.' would be more befitting the divine attribute of mediumship, rather than that knowledge which is sought after in books, schools, etc., and which anyone of fair intelligence can get, and do get if they have the price, and which too much of, we are told, maketh a man mad. The very excellent society, the Students of Nature, under the pastorship of Mrs. Summers, did give me a certificate or license as a medium. I was asked to attend on Sunday week last, by request of the church, and it was the greatest surprise of my life, for I have done less work for her society than any other, yet how it shows her true appreciation of the work that is done, not by me, but through me. I need only say in conclusion that my whole heart is in the true spiritual work and I do look forward to the time when I can devote my whole life to it."

Secretary writes from Saginaw, Mich., reporting a good meeting on the 13th inst., Dr. W. S. Eldridge officiating. Prof. P. O. Hudson, of Bay City, Mich., furnished the music. All were charmed. Dr. Eldridge will attend funerals and make engagements for camp work. Address him at 211 N. Mason street, Saginaw, Mich.

Dr. J. H. Taylor writes from Cleveland, O.: "Mr. Samuel Fish, of Milan, O., with whom I spent the winter, received the excellent premium books before I left there. The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 3, and The Next World Interviewed were very highly appreciated by them, and they wish me to thank you for your generous premiums. I have just returned to Cleveland."

Carrie F. Weatherford has a few open dates for June meetings and for camps. Will answer calls to attend funerals. Address her at Alaska, Mich., or send message by Citizens' Phone.

Harry J. Moore is open for engagements; will officiate at funerals or weddings in the city. Address him at 2979 Wabash avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. J. H. Taylor has returned to Cleveland, Ohio, after an absence of five months in Milan, Ohio. He has some vacant dates for lectures before the camp season begins. He may be addressed at 385 St. Clair street.

The South Chicago True Spiritualist Society meets every Sunday evening at 7:30 at 8927 Exchange avenue, instead of Eigenman's Hall.

P. O. Hudson writes: "Having received many letters of inquiry regarding the musical department of the Island Lake Camp, Mich., for this season, I wish to say through The Progressive Thinker (as the letters are too numerous to answer personally) as follows: Prof. P. O. Hudson, balladist, composer and violinist, is the musical director as of yore. Prof. T. H. Davenport, baritone soloist, organist, pianist and clarionettist of Bay City, is also engaged. Also a lady soprano and solo pianist from the same city. Mrs. Tuttle, contralto, of Berlin Heights, Ohio, whose son is a juvenile solo violinist, will also be engaged for the season. We enjoy the reputation of having the best vocal and instrumental music of any camp in the west, and no pains has been spared in selecting the best talent available. Mr. Cook, of Detroit, the soloist, will also be in attendance on Sundays. We shall have a most enjoyable season."

Ella M. Pitkin writes: "The Band of Harmony (auxiliary of the Church of the Soul) will give a social afternoon and evening, Thursday, May 31, in hall 608, No. 40 Randolph street. Tables will be arranged for progressive euchre, at each session. Ladies will bring lunch which will be served with tea and coffee at six o'clock. Admission free. A charge of ten cents will be made for score cards; also for coffee."

J. Bullion writes from Michigan: "Mesick and our sister village, Sherman, are all excitement, and many of our orthodox friends have been led into new channels of thought. Dr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., called upon us on his way home from Frankford, Mich. He delivered two lectures (with tests) in Sherman on Sunday, May 13, to appreciating audiences. All of the tests, descriptions and names in full were promptly recognized. He also spoke at our school house, Saturday evening and Monday evening to a house full of curious people, taking subjects from the audience, and followed by tests. He also lectured in the Carpenter school-house three miles north. Dr. Knowles is a fine magnetic speaker."

Mary Irene Dye writes from Kansas: "We enjoy the paper greatly and appreciate your 'Divine Plan' of helpfulness. We do not see how you manage to give us the books, but accept the gracious gift thankfully, and wait for more light."

The New York Sun of May 13, 1900, has the following: "New Haven, Conn., May 12.—'Prof. Lucius' Warde, a trance medium, with an extensive list of aliases, was arrested by Detective Daly to-night charged with breach of the peace. This is a subterfuge to hold him until the police of other cities where Warde is known to be wanted can be communicated with. The prisoner's description tallies with that of a crook who is alleged to have stabbed a man in Baltimore in addition to committing other crimes at various other times and places. One of these places is Butte, Mont. Warde was DeHill Morrison there while he lived at 426 Columbus avenue, Boston, as 'Professor Berthold Barmeith.' The Cleveland police, it is said, are after him for a case of embezzlement. His arrest was due to a complaint of Lionel Hartwell, his partner in the trance medium business, with whom he fought. Hartwell had him arrested and told the police all he knew of Warde, whose real name, he says, is Gearge DeLacey Kirwin, of 30 Goldsmith street, Dublin, Ireland. Warde will be held until further orders."

The Democrat, of Anderson, Ind., says: "At a meeting of the managers of the Spiritual camp grounds, held at Chesterfield, it was decided to spend $2,000 in improvements before the camp meeting opens in July. A new floor will be laid in the auditorium and other improvements made on the building. The hotel will receive considerable attention. There will be an addition built to the dining hall and tables arranged for 300 guests. There will also be a large provision, or store room, provided, from which campers and cottagers will be furnished provisions, including fresh meats and vegetables of all kinds. The dining hall and provision store will be under the charge of some person employed by the managers of the camp grounds. There will be no stand privileges or eating tents allowed on the grounds this year. All 'eating' will be supplied from the big building controlled by the management. It will contain ample lunch counters and dining hall."

Georgia Gladys Cooley has been secured to give the people of Monon, Ind., three lectures and test seances. The meetings will be held at the Monon Opera House on the evenings of May 29, 30 and 31.

Frank T. Ripley, test medium and speaker, can be engaged for the Sundays of June and July. Address all letters to 55 East Wayne street, Fort Wayne, Ind.

J. M. White writes from Alvo, Neb.: "For some time I expect to remain here and am stopping with Mr. A. T. Hinshaw, two and a half miles east of Alvo. While here I wish to hear from all camps desiring either mental or firetest mediums for the camp season."

Geo. Friend writes from Toledo, O.: "We, the members of the Independent Association of Spiritualists, unanimously unite in saying that we will close our meetings with the present month, and in so doing we close a successful five months' existence of our united efforts. At the time of the organization, December 21 last, a few who believed themselves to be staunch Spiritualists realized the pressing need of a more liberal opportunity of understanding the grand truths of our beautiful religion, took it upon themselves to launch out upon a breader sea of thought. Upon this voyage about seventy-five souls have been gathered in, and they have found peace and happiness under that great wing of immortality. We have spared neither time or trouble in demonstrating to our materialist brother the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism, and we realize that we have not bestowed labor in vain, as we have been crowned with success and we attribute that success to harmony with the spirit world. After an intermission of three months, on September 1, the association will re-open its meetings and we assure the members and friends that there will be found upon our rostrum the best talent that can be procured."

Philip Lamneck writes from Ohio: "I have become so attached to The Progressive Thinker that it is impossible for me to ever part with it. Like wine it grows better with age, and considering the quantity and quality of the Spiritual food which you every week present to your many readers, it is a great wonder that in addition thereto you can present your readers with such interesting and valuable premium books without doing yourself a material wrong."

The Old Home.

A small packge was handed me to-day which was mailed near my old home, and on opening I found it contained a beautiful picture of the little cottage where I passed my youthful years. It is empty now, and looks lonely and deserted, but yet how natural. There is snow on the ground, and some one has opened a pathway up to the door. Long icicles are clinging to the eaves, and some have fallen and lie broken on the ground beneath. In front of the house is the pretty, large, sloping lawn, and on one side of this is the garden, where we grew our vegetables, and such lovely flowers, the old kinds, pinks and sweet-williams, marigolds and roses. On the other side, and in the rear of the house is the orchard, where grew such luscious fruits, great red and golden apples. And there near the house is the well from which I drank many a cooling draught. The windows look vacant, but I can picture faces there of the long ago, faces of parents, brothers and sisters. The brothers and sisters went out to their own homes, and then for a while I lived alone with my parents. A little nephew used to come and visit us on his birthdays and spend many a merry hour, but he has grown to mature years now and is "teaching the young idea how to shoot." Father died and was carried away to the little burying ground, and mother soon followed. Then the home was owned for a while by a married sister, but soon she and her only son were called to that "bourne from whence no traveler returns." I have been for some years in a new home of my own, where love wields the scepter; where time does not hang heavy, but speeds away on golden wings. While there is much in recollections of earlier years to sadden us, yet it seems to have purified our lives, and this life is so grand and great; not downward when the years come on, but ever onward and upward until in the dim vista of years it seems only a step into that bright and beautiful life, unlimited by time.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

As there have been some inquiries received as to the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, for the benefit of all friends of the cause in the state I would say: The officers are at work getting the organization into proper and legal shape. There are several things that take time for proper completion in this way. As soon as possible printed copies of the constitution and by-laws will be mailed to contributing members. As soon as camp season is over missionaries will be put to work. You should bear in mind the fact that lack of money necessarily impedes progress in the way of incorporation and proper equipment of the office. Consequently we ask co-operation among all friends of the cause, especially in a pecuniary way, and solicit contributions to the general fund.

During the coming three months I shall be pleased to visit all places in the state that will furnish me speaking room and entertainment, and shall endeavor to aid your local work as well as the state organization. Remember this offer is open to all who desire and we hope to hear from every city and town in Wisconsin. Address A. A. McIntyre, Secretary Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, Junction, Wis., or the undersigned for dates and other arrangements. Trusting that this effort on behalf of the State Association will find favor and be productive of good to the cause of truth, I remain,

Fraternally yours,
CLARA L. STEWART,
Pres. Wis. State S. Asso.

Letter from Cuba.

To the Editor:—I have been a Spiritualist for thirty years and have often thought a company of Spiritualists could form an association for mutual help (not a commune) if climate and soil offered proper conditions. I have lived in California and Florida, but found those States not well suited; but I believe Cuba offers a climate and soil and productions eminently fitted, especially the higher mountain valleys, where, free from fevers, the raising of coffee, cocoa, tobacco and some few fruits for profitable shipment, and so many other more tender fruits for family use; besides sweet and white potatoes and half a dozen other quite good root crops, would make life easy and enjoyable. In most of these higher valleys rain is sufficient, so irrigation is not needed; the nights always cool enough for most refreshing sleep and the midday heat not prolonged—giving plenty of time in daylight for enjoyable labor or recreation. The soil is very productive for grasses or corn, making meat and milk production practical.

I say community, for no American family can afford to live alone long enough for Cuba to become English-speaking, and sufficiently American in customs, thinking to ward off the homesickness that sooner or later overcomes the judgment, and an unwise return to the States ensues. I never could tell why only the inferior peoples should occupy the most healthful and enjoyable regions of the globe. I believe Spiritualists should inaugurate the reverse of all this. People of best thoughts and aspirations should have best surroundings. Instead of letting capitalists from Atlantic coast cities buy up at from one to ten dollars per acre large desirable tracts they expect to get from twenty-five to one hundred dollars per acre for within a few years, the readers of The Progressive Thinker should send people into Cuba to investigate and select location and report facts. How to Succeed.

There seems to multiply many suggestions how to develop organized Spiritualism. One wants more religion in it, and another no religion at all; one more phenomena and another less; one more philosophy and another is tired of lectures; and now the ladies are asked to take full charge, instead of only men. If we organize a church, someone rebels because we should have only a society; and a plain society drives away the spiritually minded who desire a church to lead the people into a higher form of such organization than is now in the world. Whilst we refuse to co-operate with every struggling effort, unless it just suits us, we will fail to help the progress desired. The local, state and national associations are badly handicapped by a rebellion or refusal to co-operate when some measure is adopted which does not just suit us—as for instance the late imperfect declaration of principles.

Humanity, male and female, rich and poor, wise and ignorant (even pure and impure) should co-operate to develop truth. As we are seeking truth and spiritual culture, we must organize upon a business basis. A little common sense is frequently needed by the managers of public efforts. All sympathizers and earnest investigators should gladly co-operate. But most of all, every one who is willing to be known as a Spiritualist should liberally contribute to the financial support of the public cause. A failure to give financial help is the cause of our public lethargy. Any one who manages the society can succeed, if financially helped. Spiritualism is already popular, and thus the hypocrites may lay aside ill fear and come forth with personal allegiance. Fraternally, G. W. KATES.

LOCAL SOCIETIES.

Useful Suggestions for Spiritualists.

If Spiritualism is to continue in existence as an organized movement for only a few years longer, a radical change must take place in the methods of Spiritualists.

This must be so obvious to all who know anything of the matter, that it may seem unnecessary to write it. The important point is in what direction must the change be made. This should be as obvious, yet most Spiritualists seem so blind that they cannot see it.

Local societies and they alone keep the cause before the public in their respective localities. The literature will be almost unheard of, except by a few scattered individuals, the philosophy will be untaught and the religion unpracticed where they do not flourish. Yet, with few exceptions, they have for some time past, been growing weaker and poorer every year.

The remedy lies with each individual Spiritualist. To the extent to which he is willing to do without something else in order to contribute to the support of his local association, if there be one where he resides, and to start one if there be none, he is doing his duty to the cause he professes to love. If unwilling to make such a sacrifice, he need not seek to throw the blame upon others or search around for the origin of the trouble.

Spiritualists must have times and places for public meeting, or the truth they have, instead of burning brightly where all may see it, will only faintly flicker in individual bosoms. And when they do meet they must conduct their meetings in an orderly and rational manner. The temple in which they assemble may be as humble as circumstances render necessary, but it must be reverenced as a temple and approached in a spirit of sincere devotion to truth, not in idle curiosity for the sake of a silly amusement or even mainly for the purpose of hearing from spirit friends. Its rostrum must be used for teaching. Its ministers must be properly qualified men and women, instruments of the angel world indeed, but fitting instruments for angelic hands. And while it may be proper work for angels to inspire them, it is no less proper work for flesh and blood Spiritualists to support them.

It is natural law that no one can gain anything worth having without making some sacrifice to obtain it. Every Spiritualist is ready to say that his religion is the most beautiful and the best in the world. How much does he pay for it? That is the measure of its beauty and its utility to him.

We hear sometimes of high-priced speakers. Like the anthropophagi, the "men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders" nobody ever saw one, but they serve to talk about. Or if there are any high-priced speakers, they must be such as, dear at any price, a depleted treasury may occasion a society to place upon its platform and who deplete it still more by bringing that platform into contempt.

The local society is a necessity to Spiritualism. The educated, earnest, intelligent speaker is a necessity to the local society. To do effective work he must live by it as he would have to do in any other profession he might adopt. As well expect your physician to shoe horses for his support and attend the sick free of charge, or your lawyer to cut your hair and demand payment for that but not for legal advice, as to require the teacher of your religion and philosophy to earn his bread by other means. He cannot do it without detriment to his work.

No public teacher should be expected to give private sittings as a medium. There is always a possibility of a private medium developing into a speaker but when this is the case private mediumship should cease to be practiced, at least as a principal source of livelihood. The conditions and influences of the two phases are essentially different, and perfection can scarcely be obtained or retained in both by the same individual at the same time.

True economy may be practicable by employing settled speakers, thus saving railroad fares, and by the erection or purchase of buildings thus saving hall rents. In all other directions attempted economy seems to be real extravagance. The question commonly asked is, "What can the society do to save expenses?" If every Spiritualist, or a fair half of the number, should change it to this, "What can I do to enable the society to meet expenses?" the difficulty will be overcome. If not, before this generation shall pass away the end of Spiritualism as a distinct movement in the world will be upon us.

Our Bridge—Moses Hull.

The perusal of Moses Hull's new book on the Bible will convince any fair-minded and progressive thinker that here at last is an eternal settlement of the vexed question of the Bible so far as Spiritualists are concerned, and that the Bible is their book.

Moses Hull's place in the Biblical literature of Spiritualism is secure. He is a prophet and has been for lo, these many years. But in this his last great effort he has completed the bridge over which the modern Spiritualist may pass to the camp of the ancient Spiritualist, and settle forever every dispute regarding the significance of Bible narrative. His Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism is a clincher and it has carried conviction to thousands, but the new book is the ripe vintage of a mellowed fruit and besides an argument simply unanswerable, it is the warm, glowing comfort of this age regarding the Bible, what it is, who wrote it, why it was written, what it stands for, the explanation of obscure terms and passages, the rendition of texts in the original meaning, what the word of God is, what the holy spirit is, what the Lord is, all these absorbing questions now vexing the "higher critics" are fully and forever answered. Moses Hull is the father of what is called the higher criticism. Long before the term was coined or a clergyman grown to fit it, he had waded through and beyond all that is now jostling the cobwebs of theological hyperbole, and the Spiritualists of the world owe him a debt of gratitude second only to that due Andrew Jackson Davis and the Fox girls.

The Light of Truth takes these two books of Moses Hull's, "The Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism" and "The Bible, Who Wrote It?" as the bedrock of Spiritualism along this line.—Light of Truth.

SOME QUERIES.

About the Objective and Subjective Ego.

In your issue for May 19, is one of the greatest treats I have experienced for many a long day. I mean the article headed "The Size of Man," by the brilliant California philosopher, Charles Dawbarn. I have read and re-read the article, and my ego cries for more. I want to thank our friend and brother, Charles Dawbarn, for the said article, and hope very early he will favor your readers with another article, in which—personally—I would be pleased if he will tell us how through the ether waves one subjective mind acts on another subjective mind, so as to restore the person to health again. J. J. Hudson in his book, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," says, page 29: The objective mind takes cognizance of the objective world; its media of observation are the five physical senses. The subjective mind takes notice of its environments by means independent of the physical senses, it perceives by intuition, it performs its highest functions when the objective senses are in abeyance (or asleep). Page 152: "How the subjective mind controls the functions and sensations of the body, man may never know." "That man is possessed of two minds, an objective and subjective."

Charles Dawbarn in his article says: "When we enter the silence the ego is in full activity. I mean that this expression by ego of his greater fullness is necessarily going on now." "Where the silence begins for the mortal, ego is expressing a new personality, but only because we are not yet broad enough to see and sense that the two personalities are but manifestations of the one ego in operation at the same time."

If I understand it rightly, Hudson says "Man has two minds, an objective and subjective, that when the objective mind is quiescent the subjective mind is active." Dawbarn says: "Where the silence begins for the mortal, ego is expressing a new personality—that the two personalities are but manifestations of the one ego." DR. W. YATES.

Fox Sisters' Monumental Tablet.

To the Editor:—You kindly inserted Friend Merritt's and my appeal for this (apparently) good purpose, viz., some tribute of love and respect for these, our first workers and martyrs.

It did seem a just and merited cause to thus commemorate their service and lives for Spiritualism, and the first little raps received at the Hydesville cottage.

A lesson and moral came to me from this, your kind notice, and my efforts, namely, The folly and little use of any but personal soliciting to gain funds for church charity or any good cause.

And second: We really injure (sometimes) and do little good by striving to give lasting testimony to love, worship or any sacred memory, with tablets, mementoes or tributes of wood or stone. Good words and noble lives, heroic deeds, the divine and truly beautiful, will live, and any one who has striven to make life brighter and the world better, needs no monument.

Peter said unto Jesus: "Master, it is good for us to make here three tabernacles, one for Thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias,"—"not knowing what he said." And thus with your appeal and my letters for the Fox sisters which really resulted in nothing, only $1 and two letters of inquiry.

This has so often proved the same in the past with so many great and good names of poets, priests and kings who have only a remembrance from their good deeds and lives.

What matters it what men or angels think or say in comparison to the "well done" of the spirit. All true acts, noble lives, yes, even beautiful thoughts, are enduring—cannot die, and must live, and each gives its exact, sure reward or blessing.

With these conclusions, how wisely and lovingly spirits seem to guard the memory and love of the Fox sisters, which we wish to commemorate—but not with tablets or monuments—but to cherish in our hearts, and consecrate with high and holy deeds, for the religion of Spiritualism and the cause of humanity. Are They Dreams, or Visions?

I have had many strange experiences in my sleeping conditions, and am at a loss to know whether they are only dreams or really belong to the true spirit life.

Nearly all whom I called friends while here in earth form, are gone from my visible sight, but scarcely a night passes but what I see some of them, as they were in this life, but never only three have I dreamed of knowing them to have passed on to the other side—and these left upon my mind a strong impression, which still remains with me, as having seen them in reality, although many of my other nightly visitations with old time comrades have been very pleasant.

One of those whom I saw as having passed over, appeared before me on bended knees, seeming to be in tears, and feeling sadly on account of having caused me some serious trial while here, and implored my forgiveness, at the same time asking me if I did not think I, too, had been somewhat in the fault. I responded in the affirmative, and in turn asked her forgiveness.

I don't believe that spirits are really happy over there, having wronged while here any human being, until they meet them face to face and they become reconciled to each other; and this is the kind of confession, and the only kind, that I really have any faith in, as being necessary to the soul's upliftment in the line of progressive happiness.

Another spirit whom I saw in my sleep was a young friend who passed on from New Jersey last spring. I seemed to be walking with her in some strange place, on a great public highway. We did not converse. At the end of our walk, I turned and looked her square in the face (we had been walking arms around each other, for we were great friends) thinking to myself, Why, Ida, you are now no longer living in earth life, but on the other side. She seemed happy and was as fair as the morning—was attired in bright blue, trimmed with white lace, such as she never wore while in the form. I do not know where she went or how, but she disappeared, and I suddenly awoke, feeling that I had really had from her a visit—or, rather, a silent interview.

I wrote to her young husband, (not a Spiritualist, although she was) and told him about it, and that I believed she was with him, trying to aid, comfort and console his bereaved, distressed condition of mind. He wrote me that he had received through a public medium, undeniable tests of his wife's dear angel presence, which was great comfort. JULIA H. JOHNSON.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. Augir: Q. (1) How many are there who hold communion with the departed?

(2) What proportion of those who die in full belief in the Christian faith, retain that belief for any length of time after their transition?

A. Mediumship, in a greater or less degree is possessed by the larger portion of mankind, who unconsciously receive impressions from spirit sources. Accurate statistics would be impossible, but spirit intelligences claiming to know approximately have stated the number of pronounced believers in the world as exceeding three millions.

(2) All Christians retain their full belief, after death, and the time required for them to outgrow dogmatic training, is indeterminable, depending on their companionship and trend of thought. If they mingled constantly with those who believed in the church doctrines, ages might pass and yet they would be expecting to meet Christ, or go up to the light of the "great white throne."

Dogmatic training is not only a great misfortune in earthly life, it is a blight on the spirit.

Patient, Tallahassee: Q. You speak disparagingly of drugs, what can we use as a substitute?

A. The disparagement was more particularly applicable to the compounds of minerals, as it is far from proven that the system can directly assimilate. Only by their combinations in organized substance is this made possible. Perhaps salt may be excepted, but it is a question yet unsettled if the food does not contain sufficiency of this substance to meet the requirements of digestion. There is no doubt, however, that its use as a condiment is greatly excessive and an unnecessary strain thrown thereby on the excretory organs in freeing the system of its injurious presence.

Many of the vegetable remedies are concentrated from articles of food, such as asparagus, celery, etc., while others are the most virulent poisons known. The readiness of their absorption, contributes to their activity, and again the question arises, How can a drug that is poisonous—that is destructive to the processes of life—be beneficial in the lesser doses which the system is able to throw off? Morphine, atrophine, strychnine and a host of other remedies relied on by physicians, paralyze the nerves, excite to spasmodic action, or strike directly at the centers of nervous force. As a last resort their use may be beneficial—although this has not been demonstrated.

Food is nature's panacea for all ills. The body is built up out of food, water, and air, by the rays of the sun. Keep all these balanced and in purity and perfect health is the result. Then there is a state of health which is immune against all forms of disease, even the most contagious.

Of these four elements of health, the food is of first consideration, as its selection, now that the primitive guiding instincts have been obscured by artificial tastes, is by desire and not the requirements of health.

Flesh in its various forms is the principal reliance, and vegetables are only accessories. Flesh of healthy animals of itself may not be objectionable. It is almost perfectly assimilable, but contains no principle that acts on the secreting and excreting organs, which for animals of mixed diet, as man, is essential. Hence it is that a flesh diet, loads the system with waste matter, uric acid and its compounds, by which rheumatism, gout and fevers are the speedy consequence. When waste is retained it becomes the prolific soil of the swarms of microbes feeding on this decayed matter, and thus gaining entrance, attack the blood and healthy tissues.

The great variety of vegetables and fruits furnish correctives, and may be regarded as nature's medicines, compounded in her wondrous laboratory, for the purpose of not only curing disease, but preventing it by keeping the body free from impurities.

If the liver and kidneys are torpid, tomatoes, turnips, asparagus are preferable to calomel or protopholine. For nervous restlessness, coughs, colds, liver complaint and scurvy, onions surpass morphine. Lettuce is a cure for insomnia. The blood may be supplied with iron by spinach and pears, and gravel has been cured by onions and spinach, after all other remedies had failed. As a diuretic nothing is as beneficial as asparagus. Asthma is relieved by carrots. For fevers lemons, cranberries, and acid fruits are the best food and medicine. Constipation readily yields to fruits, especially grapes, and diarrhea to raspberries, blackberries or their cordials. Celery is of general benefit and sedative.

The apple supplies phosphates to the brain, assists the kidneys and liver, prevents gravel and relieves dyspepsia. Tea, coffee and cocoa are nerve stimulants, and prevent waste. Study carefully the needs of the system, and make the bill of fare accordingly, so as to take all medicines as food. Pure water is the best stimulant. Pure air and all the sunshine that can be taken are the other factors, but not considered in this reply.

It will be correctly inferred that the active remedial principles contained in the varieties of foods, or similar principles which are found in plants not used for food, may be extracted and administered in more concentrated form, and thus the mistakes in choosing the right articles of diet be temporarily and more quickly overcome. It will be further inferred that the science of medicine, must completely change front and base by admission of these fundamental facts. The old idea that there is a drug, a panacea for every ill, or that mineral poisons mingled in the system can destroy disease, as an alkali, neutralizes an acid; or that diseased organs can be restored thereby, belongs to the age of leeches, blisters, blood-letting, purging and vomiting, which in the last generation made the name of doctor synonymous with death.

And yet there is a great work ahead to educate the people, who ignorantly believe that whatever be their ailings, the doctors have remedies that if rightly chosen will cure. This ignorance is the harvest field of patent medicines, of which it may be maintained with absolute certainty that all the money expended therefor is as utterly wasted as through thrown into the fire, even more, they are one and all a damage instead of benefit.

H. Fuller, M. D.: It would be as well to refer spiritual manifestations to water, air, or heat as to electricity and magnetism. As in hypnotism, the laws on which it depends are the same as those governing the control by spirits of mediums, and hence it is illustrative of psychic manifestations. It, however, does not explain the least of the physical phenomena.

The exercise of mediumship carried too far is injurious, because it rapidly depletes the vital energy. When not exercised until followed by exhaustion, the health will improve, rather than be impaired.

Fred G. Ware: Q. While an inmate of the Soldiers' Home in California, I became acquainted with Mr. W. G. Wheeler, who was a medium and clairvoyant. One evening as we came from supper, we met a Mr. Johnson, to whom Mr. Wheeler said, "I have just had a communication from the Rev. Dr. Watson, of Memphis, Tenn., saying that he had passed from this life." About a week after, when The Progressive Thinker came we received our first knowledge of the departure of Mr. Watson. Taking into consideration the difference in time between Memphis and San Francisco, the communication was made within a few minutes of the time Dr. Watson left his mortal body. This has been a wonderful occurrence to me, and I would like to know if others have had similar experiences.

A. The fact is interesting as connected with the death of that noble man, the Rev. Watson, but volumes of similar occurrences might be readily collected, and form a cumulative demonstration of the continuance of life after the death of the body.

"Folk Lore," Galveston, Texas: Q. As all sayings must have had a beginning, can you tell us the origin of "Nine tailors make a man?"

A. The study of the origin of these ancient sayings is of great interest and the disclosures made are often wonderful. In the old days in England, before the age of newspapers, various expedients were employed to spread the news. Thus tolling the church bell for a death, and this still further refined to distinguish a man from a woman or a child. Three strokes three times repeated gave the message that it was a man; and three times two, a woman. For a child, twice three for a boy, and twice two for a girl. These strokes were called tellers, and hence it was said "Nine tellers mark a man," which was changed into the senseless saying of "Nine tailors," etc.

THE CAMP-MEETINGS.

Inquiries are coming to this office already in relation to dates of Camp-meetings. All secretaries who have the best interest of their camps at heart will send at once the dates of opening and closing their respective camps, giving the name and address of the proper officers to whom applications can be made for programmes and other necessary information.

Camp Cassadaga.

The management of beautiful Lily Dale are preparing for a great time this coming season, every one seems to be entering into the spirit of making everything attractive for the prospective visitors, and by the way things are looking and the number of visitors already on the grounds this promises to be a banner season for this place.

Visitors are arriving on every train, cottages are being opened, painters and paper hangers are reaping a harvest, and many improvements are taking place all over the grounds. The Grand Hotel will soon be opened, The Leolyn Hotel on the outside of the grounds, will open June 1. The South Park is open with quite a number of visitors on its register. All the hotels have had great improvements on them.

The philosophy will be represented by a very able body of lecturers and teachers. Mr. Moses Hull, that renowned lecturer and scholar, ably assisted by his wife and a corps of able teachers, open their Spiritualistic Training School on the Lily Dale camp-grounds, the session commencing May 14, closing July 13. The object of the school is to train its students for thinking, writing, public speaking and mediumship. The school should meet with the success it deserves, and a very interesting circular is published, giving details of the work. Parties interested should send to Moses Hull, Lily Dale, N. Y., for circular. Many are arriving daily to join these classes.

There will be all phases of the phenomena represented for the Spiritualists and investigators to choose from, many of the finest psychics from the north, east, south and west have already rented cottages for the approaching season, representing materialization, etherealization, transfiguration, etc., slate-writers, spirit artists, clairvoyance, business mediums, healers, doctors, palmists, spirit photographers, trumpet mediums and various others.

Taking all in all, what with our teachers in Philosophy and our demonstrators of the phenomena, it should insure a big season for glorious Lily Dale.

I should also mention that this place is becoming famous as a health resort, why should it not? for we have the finest drinking water, invigorating pine groves, natural lakes and situated 800 feet above Lake Erie, and last though not least are the pleasant drives surrounding this locality, in fact we have every thing to make life beautiful and healthful.

In conclusion I would say many fine souvenirs and programmes are being printed for the season's work; any person wishing one should send address, name and 2-cent stamp for postage to us and we will take great pleasure in sending such souvenir and programme.

Our Cause at Lynn, Mass.

I would like to tell you something of the progress of Spiritualism in this city. About twelve years ago a number of friends used to go to some wooded spot on the outskirts and hold a social circle on every pleasant Sunday during the warm weather. From this little band has sprung our association, known as Camp Progress Association. We have a large roofed pavilion with seats for about 900, a cook-house, tables to seat about a hundred, also roofed over. We meet and hold three services every Sunday from June to the last of September, with good music from organ and voices. Miss Amanda Bailey, who is widely known as a vocalist, has been with us until ill health has caused her removal from the State. Last season we had large audiences, frequently numbering three thousand people. This year we expect to have Miss Lizzie Harlow with us on our opening day, as she was present last year on the first Sunday. These open air meetings are productive of great good as many visit the grove who would not go to a hall. We have always the best of order at our meetings and that without the presence of an officer, and we have never had an arrest on our grounds in all the time we have held meetings. Our president, Mr. L. D. Milliken, is also president of the Spiritualist Association which meets in Cadet Hall, Lynn. Vice-president, Mr. N. H. Gardiner, of Salem; secretary, Mrs. N. H. Gardiner; treasurer, Mrs. H. O. Merrill, Lynn. Our grove is located in Upper Swampscott, and Lynn and Salem electrics pass our entrance, each way every fifteen minutes, making it easily accessible from all points, and we hope to make, if possible, our meeting even more interesting than in the past.

MRS. H. O. MERRILL.
Lynn, Mass.

A GHOST.

It Is In an Ohio Farm House.

The members of the family of James Miller, who live near Mount Eaton, O., are terror stricken at the appearance of the ghost of a woman, which, they say, paid them frequent visits lately and has acted in a most unaccountable manner.

The uncanny visitor made its first appearance about a week ago, after all the members of the household except Mr. Miller had gone to bed. He remained up later than usual to take a good-night smoke before the fire. As he sat puffing sleepily he says he heard a strange noise behind him, as of some one sobbing. Turning about, he beheld the form of a woman, clothed in white, standing with bowed head and weeping bitterly. Mr. Miller started to his feet in surprise, as he had bolted all the doors leading to the house shortly before.

The woman was a stranger to him, and the manner of her entrance to the house was so mysterious that he asked her how she had got in. At this the figure in white looked up at him with tearful eyes and then walked slowly into the kitchen.

The dazed farmer followed wonderingly, and by the light that came from the sitting-room he says he saw the ghostly visitor place a skillet on the stove and begin to make preparations for a meal. She rattled the dishes in the cupboard and placed two plates on the table.

The rattle of the culinary utensils reached the ears of Mrs. Miller, who was yet awake up stairs, and she called down to her husband to learn what was the matter. At the sound of her voice the woman in white slowly faded away.

Mr. Miller immediately aroused all the members of the family and told them what he had seen. They believed he had been dreaming until he showed them the skillet which still stood on the stove. There were no plates on the table, but the white cloth had been unfolded and spread at haphazard. All the doors of the house were locked, and a thorough search in the vicinity failed to reveal the whereabouts of the visitor.

The second night after the incident, which was yet unexplained, Andrew Miller, the farmer's son, aged about 23 years, who had been to the village for the mail, arrived home after the rest of the family had retired. As he entered the house, he says, the form of a woman stole in after him and stood, with drooping head, before the fire. The young man thought at once of the ghost his father claimed to have seen and determined to investigate.

He accordingly advanced boldly toward the woman in white and laid his hand on her. As he did so she seemed to elude him, and, turning about, he saw her standing in the same drooping posture several feet distant. Another effort to capture her was as futile as the first, and, bent on solving the mystery, he entered an adjoining room, and procuring a loaded shotgun, returned. The figure was still standing before the fire, and taking deliberate aim, he fired.

Simultaneously with the report of the weapon came an awful shriek, and as the smoke cleared away all trace of the ghost had vanished, but the old clock which had stood in the corner was shattered by the load of shot which had passed through its case. The shot frightened the members of the family, who had retired, and when the son told them his story of the ghost they were mystified more than ever. The Millers are just now worked up to such a nervous tension that they are afraid to retire at night, and have announced their intention of moving.

The appearance of the ghost in the house has revived a long forgotten tale that many years ago an old bachelor who lived there at that time was alleged to have killed a young girl who worked for him. Many are of the belief that the ghost is her returned spirit. The affair has caused much gossip among the neighbors, who have made up watching parties and wait every night within the Miller home for the reappearance of the ghost.—Cleveland Plaindealer.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. DEATH DEFEATED,

The Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young,

It certainly is just what is needed as a book of good suggestions and instructions along the line of health. He treats the subject in his own matter-of-fact style. The book comprises a practical subject handled in a practical manner by a practical man. Even if people do not wish or expect to live here always, they should know how to live right and enjoy the life that belongs to them. This is undoubtedly the most useful book for the masses the Doctor has ever published, for it strikes at the root or cause of disease, and tells how to avoid it. 212 pages, cloth bound. Price, $1. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, And All Being.

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

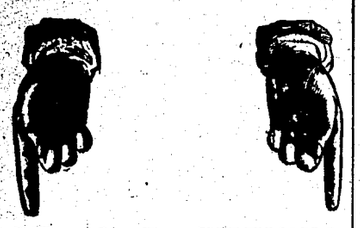
"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.



"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be", So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

TRUTH

The only way to find out who is the "Greatest Psychic Physician living" is to read what their patients say.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

never claims that he is the greatest physician living, or that he is the

GREATEST PSYCHIC.

He believes that there are hundreds of healers who are just as successful as he is, and he never yet has claimed that he is or was the best psychic, although twenty years before the public as the independent slate-writer with the record of not one person who ever accused him of fraud, ought to make the public THINK when they compare his claims to other so-called psychics.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

only desires those who are sick to remember that for over twenty years he has been before the public as a psychic, and over twelve years as a physician, and he never claims greater powers than others; but we believe he has a right to think he has as great gifts as those who claim so much.

Kindly read the following

BOOK REVIEWS.

Essays and Lectures, Written and Delivered at the Free Temple Before the Root Progressive Lyceum. By R. N. Wilcox. Pp. 206.

Proof of a Continued Life; or Why I Believe in a Future Existence. By R. N. Wilcox. Pp. 153.

These volumes are remarkable in the fact that the author set the type and printed them entirely with his own hands; and their appearance, type, paper and press-work, would be creditable to any printing office.

Mr. Wilcox is known to the readers of The Progressive Thinker in connection with Mrs. Wilcox, as the founders of the Spiritual Temple at Avery, Ohio, where Mr. Dunkin lectured two years most acceptably. A fine lyceum was organized in connection. Mr. Wilcox, as his narrative informs the reader, has been an eager student all his life, and has become recipient of the best forms of mediumship. He has been fortunate in his investigations, and has accumulated tests sufficient to fill a volume.

In Proofs of a Continued Existence he gives a quaint history of his early life, his religious training, his conversion, his growing skepticism, his awakened interest in Spiritualism. It is an interesting narrative, and one in which hundreds and thousands will see their own experiences as in a mirror. There is scarcely a phase of the manifestations which he has not investigated, and gives an example. The volume is illustrated with a half-tone of the author, and several spirit faces taken by photography. The reader will understand that many of these evidences rest on evidence of Mr. Wilcox alone. In seances held mostly alone this could not well be otherwise.

Of the Essays, while it is unjust to particularize, perhaps one of the most characteristic, is that on Disease. It is viewed from the spiritual, or rather vitapathic standpoint.

"The first stroke of disease is the first act in the process of death. Disease is death in its primary stage. The first impaired function of the human body is the first step in the soul's departure from its house of clay, and unless checked and health restored, it will gradually withdraw from the body unfit to contain it. The most of diseases and their causes are under the control of human beings, and mankind generally produce their own diseases, many of which causes can be removed and disease prevented."

After giving the various causes of disease he continues:

"There is still another great case of disease more potent for evil perhaps than any or all other causes combined, and that is the improper use of drugs in the treatment of disease. There is no doubt that improper drug medication has produced more diseases, and more deaths than the sword, famine and pestilence combined. Medical men themselves see its bad effects and some of them are honest enough to proclaim against it. Their whole system is in violation of every law of the vital organism. Every dose of medicine is a poison, an outrage against nature, and a war on the human constitution."

Other essays give a clear view of the vitapathic system, of which the author is a recent graduate.

Mr. Wilcox has given two useful books to the spiritual public. H. T.

Spiritualism Among the Shakers.

This is a very interesting account of Spiritual manifestations among the Shakers from 1837 to 1847—for a period of ten years before the date of Modern Spiritualism as initiated by the Fox children. It is noticeable that the manifestations of Shaker Spiritualism also commenced with the children. Shaker mediums foretold the spread of spirit manifestations throughout the world.

This little pamphlet of about 100 pages contains succinct accounts, by various members of the Shaker Order, of the manifestations in the various Shaker communities in the United States.

Mr. Henry C. Blinn, East Canterbury, N. H. is the author and compiler, and the work may be obtained of him.

Discovery of a Lost Trail. By Charles B. Newcomb.

The author says in his preface: "It is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing which we call life. * * Plain suggestions of confidence, patience, gladness and decision often bring us back to the trail we have lost through the uncertainty of our own power and freedom. When we are really assured of the right road we can truly believe that life is a song and not a cry." These words disclose the keynote to which the book is attuned. It is a book of spiritual helpfulness, reaching down and through all the being of man, physical, mental and moral, and tending to bring all into accord in the unities of the Infinite Life.

It teaches that man is his own creator, and can dominate what his mind has expressed. He can change at will the colors or the texture of the thought with which he builds.

"Health and prosperity result from our awakening to consciousness of spiritual power. Inflammation, fever and congestion are the natural results of interrupted circulation in thought life."

"If we listen with a mournful mind life seems to us a wail of sorrow. We do not hear the swelling undertone of love. When we are done with our complaints all voices become melodious."

"The healing principle is a positive thought, and anything that can arouse this to vigorous action will obtain results."

We might go on extracting rich nuggets of thought from every one of the 282 pages of this volume, but we forbear, with a hearty wish that every one who reads this might procure and read and re-read this book whose chapter is so fraught with wise spiritual instruction. It may be obtained at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, cloth bound, $1.50.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. Charlotte Bacon ascended to her coronation, May 7, 1900. She was born in 1812 in Dover, Vermont. In 1835 she was married to Nathan H. Bacon. Five children were born to them, four of whom are still living in the mortal. Mother Bacon was for many years a staunch Spiritualist. Though nearly 90 years of age, she held all her faculties of body and mind till the last. She was always at her post, both afternoon and evening, to within two Sundays of her transition. No disease wasted her form or blighted her closing hours. She slept sweetly while angels disrobed her of her garments of mortality, and arrayed her in magnificent vestments for her coronation. The ceremonies of the occasion on the spirit side of life were in keeping with her character and station, for, she had so lived that she ranked with angels. On the mortal side her funeral was really in the nature of a reception. It was held at the home of her son, Prof. J. Frank Bacon, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion, with a profusion of white

Dear Readers:—Did you ever think that the reason why so many sick people cannot get help is because their case is not understood by their physician? so, of course, he cannot give them a remedy that will pass to the afflicted parts and open the natural passages for disease to be cast out. So physician and patient are working under a disadvantage. Why not write and find out just what and where your disease is located? That ought to give you confidence to let them prescribe for you, then you will enjoy good health. Just read what some of the happy ones say:

Mrs. F. Loucks—Dear Madam:—I desire to offer you my grateful testimony to the good that your treatment has done me. I was very much reduced by Nervous Prostration about two years ago and my restoration was magical, from complete prostration to strength and energy, within three days after taking your remedies. Since then I have had two attacks of stomach trouble, which also yielded to the remedies immediately. Your diagnosis was perfect being correct in every particular. Yours sincerely,
Ayer, Mass., March 15, 1900. MYRA McLEAN.

My dear Mrs. Loucks:—I suppose by this time you would like to hear from me. Your medicine is doing its work surely and wonderfully. I feel better than I have for three years. You would be surprised if you could see me now and when I began my treatment. Send me some of your circulars to give to my friends. May the angels bless and keep you is my wish. MRS. H. A. TRASK.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 463 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

MAN THE MICROCOSM.

His Infinite and Divine Relations. Intuition—The Light Within. By Giles B. Stebbins. Price, 10c.

KAREZZA.

ETHICS OF MARRIAGE.

By Alice B. Stockham, M. D.

Karezza makes a plea for a better birthright for children, and aims to lead individuals to seek a higher development of themselves through most sacred relations. It is pure in tone and aim, and should be widely circulated. Price, cloth, $1.

ASTRAL WORSHIP,

By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 329 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our society, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—short, in the entire material and physical contributions which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of culture in general."—Buechner.

"BEFORE ABRAHAM WAS, I AM."

An Inspirational Lecture Delivered by the Guides of Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, in the Temple at Fort Worth, Texas, March 4, 1900.

INVOCATION.

Oh, ye immortal and loving angels, whose faces turn to the light of the realms we have not seen, ye who stand at the portals of the City of Love, who have passed through its gate-ways, we ask that ye will send us some message of your joy, some tender word to make us know that where ye dwell within the light of truth divine, we, too must sometimes stand and feel the thrill of joy, shall sense that we have journeyed home into the Father's house, the many mansions eternal that are not made with hands. Oh, thou eternal Father, whose love encompasses this world or worlds, whose universal law of growth and unfoldment forever surrounds us, we ask for the quickening of every sense that shall make us know, we ask for that consciousness that shall make us realize the goodness of love to-day, the unfoldment, the grand and holy stairway by which our trembling feet may tread upward and outward to the light, the love, the guidance divine; and make us grateful for that which we have received, and from the gratitude within our breasts let spring the growing flowers of love and kindness for our human kind. Teach us to honor thee, to reverence those who stand within the City's gates, by deeds of kindness and affection here; teach us to follow in the steps of him who led in meekness and in love and taught his fellow men the brotherhood of man, the fatherhood of God. Amen.

DISCOURSE.

The world has always had plenty of people, whether Jews or Gentiles to ask questions, to criticise, to sneer and to doubt. The world has been filled, ever since history has had its place, with a class of people who receive nothing until they are forced to do so. It is the old story repeated over again from time to time. Man can only discern that which he is forced to. Man's understanding is something of growth. He realizes hunger because in the structure of his physical body there is something that makes him hungry; he realizes the necessity of gaining knowledge, because there is something in his being that reaches out and asks for food and is not content until found. He does not take it as willingly as he might, but he receives it in his old way by disputing and reasoning and denying. Man has always been trying to assert himself in the wrong direction. You tell him a very reasonable thing and he immediately undertakes to explain it in a very unreasonable manner. You say to him that he is an immortal soul, and he will say to you that he is not a soul at all, but simply a part of the material world; that is the average individual who has never soared out into the realms of thought and peered through the mists that surround our spiritual life. You tell a man of to-day that he is to live forever, he wonders at you; he likes to dispute you because he thinks you cannot verify your position. You tell him that he is an immortal spirit and he asks how you know it. You tell him that he is occupying an equal station with others of his kind in this world and the next, and he questions it. He always attempts to hold his place by that obstinacy that has characterized him throughout history. This is all well enough; it is all necessary or it would not be. But among this class of beings from all time have come those who have had the inspiration of truth, who have grasped something new that their fellow men have not as yet received, and they have never been forgotten, not once, for having this inspiration.

Whenever a man has grasped a great truth, either in the ancient biblical days or later on in the world's progress, in what way has he usually been treated? The world has ever given such a man the same usage, and a king or a peasant, as the case might be, has undergone persecution in accordance with the time in which he lived. However, the truths they inculcated lasted, and when the manifestation of truth was permanently established the people grew sore afraid and turned around and tried to worship what they had persecuted. It seems very strange to us now when we think of many such instances of the past, but have we gotten away entirely from this ancient obstinacy? If somebody brings us a new truth do we not try the same things and deny in the same way, and after our denials, when the fact has been established, do we not very humbly make our offerings as of old? This human family hasn't changed so very much after all since the days of Abraham.

When Jesus of Nazareth came into this world, although he had been prophesied and promised and the people talked of him as the Spirit of the Living Truth, what did the people do? They denied everything, they refused everything. They said this man is not what he is proclaimed to be. They accused him of divers charges, with the old word of devils upon their tongues. They disputed against anybody and everybody who went outside of their poor and beggared comprehension. Jesus of Nazareth declared truths that have been handed down to us unsullied and unstained. We have at the present day all too frequently his brightest and best statements crystallized and made into the narrowest forms. His splendid suggestions of the brotherhood of humanity and the fatherhood of God have been by many of us considered as belonging to the smaller part of humanity. The great universal laws of freedom, of love, joy and truth to all have been sadly and pitifully neglected, and over this one brief verse that we have here to-night there has been more controversy and discussion, squabble and quibble, than almost any other. There have been so many statements made, so many declarations in regard to it that it is almost impossible to follow out any path that others have not taken. And so when we come to it simply what does it mean in its simplest and best interpretation to the world? "Jesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am." He speaks just before this of the joy and gladness that Abraham has had in him, and while they speak of the dead, his thought is of the living. His declaration here is not that Abraham in the physical body knows him as Jesus in the physical body, but that Abraham is glad, is full of joy in connection with him. He says more than this; he declares that "before Abraham was, I am." What does that mean? Does it not mean that important fact that has always stood forth in the character of the eternal Christ's spirit, that he is not simply an individual born into this life to carry through it the expressions of this physical existence and to pass out of it on the cross in suffering and pain, but that he is an eternal spirit, an essence of that great principle, of the everlasting and divine fact that has neither beginning nor ending, a soul eternal, unending, unchanging, as existed in the principle of the Christ. How many of us are broad enough, large enough to grasp this truth, and to sense that the soul who said at that time "before Abraham was, I am," is now; that the same spirit, the same principle changed not at all, stands out master of all nations and all peoples. It does not matter whether we use that name or whether we use some other, it is the eternal principle of boundless love, the universal spirit of life, eternal life for all humanity. And how does it mean this? It means that that Christ's spirit that was before Abraham, that is now, that has been through all time and ever will be, is the path of truth and light, the essence and strength of that divine love, that unchanging compassion which all humanity must imbibe before it becomes conscious of its own nearness and kindredship with God.

I have been teaching you for four years the greatest principles of Spiritualism. Not simply the fact that we live here and hereafter, that we can through the light of divine truth commune with our friends but that greater truth than this, that spirit is eternal, that soul is everlasting, and that in order for us to reach the unfoldment of that knowledge which shall lift us out of the shackles of death and ignorance, we must reach that condition of the Christ's spirit when we can put aside all hate, all evil and stand in the light of an everlasting and unchanging principle of love. Jesus of Nazareth is not to be looked upon in this as a simple individual born into this world, suffering and dying, but as an eternal principle that was before Abraham, the Great I Am of all time, that mysterious and wonderful principle that has been handed down to us with all its beauty and fullness, if we will but grasp it. Why is it that upon this simple word, I Am, so much stress has been laid in our mystic orders of the past? Why is it it holds in certains orders to-day a meaning that is of almost more importance than any other word? Why is it that we find in it that which leads us out from the narrow contemplation of self into the broader realms of light? Taken in its personal application to you, I am, the ego, and add to this to make it more emphatic, I cannot cease to be, I am, and I continue to exist, and what does it mean? It means that the last assertion of Jesus of Nazareth is the assertion of everlasting force, and life and power, and that when we once grasp the fullness of this, when we realize its meaning, it leads to the kinship of the immortal soul with the infinite and eternal law of God. It means that in it is the declaration of that age, that life, that co-equalism with all time, and it means that the comprehension of this gives a mark of everlasting force and life in its fullness and completion to all existence.

Abraham, that ancient and wonderful character, from whose tent have journeyed forth such a class of individuals along life's pathway, those who stood and discoursed with Jesus of Nazareth, who looked back over the path that led to the shade of Abraham's tent. What wonderful lessons there are along that road. How much they are when properly understood, and how little have the usual interpretations given us of the true light. So many say this simply means that Christ was declaring himself as God. If you read the earlier part of the chapter you will find all the suggestion of respect, of love, of honor for his father, the consciousness of a higher individual, as existing separately from that great fatherhood, and yet in it lies the subtle suggestion of the parallel line of life.

All the questions of life which puzzled those ancient men confront us today. We may all look at them differently, but the one central principle remains forever, and that is that this living, unchanging love that belonged to that parallel time, belongs to this present time and whether we stand beneath the tent of Abraham or here in the busy marts of our modern cities, the echoing sounds of truth that changes this sadness of life to divine comprehension reaches our ears and that day comes down to our present need and necessity. What were this world of ours if we took from it that principle of love? Take it away and we have left greed, selfishness and hatred. We may not know how much there is of love within us until we are tested by trial by sorrow and pain. We may grow bitter and sad and sorrowful, but all this is part of the lesson and by and by when we least expect it we break the trammels and bonds that have made us least ourselves, and the triumph of the love within us comes rising, again declaring itself. No matter whether it is an Easter day or not, we hear from every side the echoes of that principle, it speaks of what it has been, of what it is to be, and once more through the lips of humanity in each brave deed, in every noble uprising of humanity we hear the words, "Before Abraham was, I am, and I continue to be."

The world has never had a great sacrifice, has never had a noble act, has never had a vast truth expounded but what those who suffered and who went through the agonies of giving birth to them, declared something of that existence that is not measured by the few brief years here from the cradle to the grave. Who of us would dare to say that any of our martyrs our great prophets, our splendid and noble heroes of past or present time have simply lived in the brief and narrow confines of childhood to the time when they laid them down to sleep the sleep of the just. Do you dream that a man's life is encompassed in the few brief years that he lives and struggles in this world? Do you think that you and I are only here while we are manifest through these physical bodies of ours? Is it your supposition that we only live from the time when through the wailing gates of birth we enter upon the shadows of childhood, and as the years go by walk out into the deep waters of life and at last journey across the narrow waters and stand upon the shore of a future existence? Is this all that life means to us? The journey across the narrow peninsula of our modern, of our simple existence. Know, oh ye immortal beings, that beyond this land lies the heights of eternity that every soul has journeyed across, and when we have made our steps here and left the imprint of our feet upon the sands of this life that we are crossing now, we shall journey back again to those heights into the vast ocean of eternity and God.

We do not lose existence, we do not gain it. We have it, it is ours. Truly the soul is always singing the song that Jesus uttered, but the people who heard him only recognized that Abraham had lived, sat under his tent, had died and been gathered to his fathers, "Before Abraham was, in the physical expression, I am," echoes down through the ages, and he and she who hear it aright question not its meaning but know its truth and realize their kinship with him who said, "I am eternal, everlasting and there is no limitation to my life." This is the thought that belongs to us properly; this is the truth that comes with its triumph over death and sin and disappointment and declares itself everywhere and tells us of the indestructibility of God's universe of light. When we think of this it lifts us out of the little ruts of our disappointments our discontent and our misery. It raises us to the realms of eternity and makes us feel that our souls are but sojourning in this world; that we are like some flower gathered from the great stem of nature's bounteous plant and cherished for a day or two, and then to wither and fade away. But is this the end of life? A thousand times no. It is the end of that painted blossom, but the unlimited, eternal life, the individual existence goes on and on forever. This is the true thought of life; this is the song that rises from the solemn silence of the night and breaks the clouds asunder, or touches them and they burst into the glory of bloom, when it reaches the very heavens of God.

We are all of us so small and narrow in comprehension we try to take great truths and bring them down to the shadows that are thrown by our little candles. How strange it is to see a man light a match and turn on a certain light to investigate the sun, and yet we do it constantly in our efforts to understand great truths by little and small measures. If we take the life of Jesus of Nazareth, if we study his statements from first to last, we find him always declaring that subtle energy, that invisible power, that latent force which he recognizes in himself and in others. Hear him when he talks to his apostles, see how he teaches the people, see how his indignation at once rises and how he is forced to say things that seem bitter and harsh. Yet all this comes in unison with the truth of eternal spirit in its victory over material things. It declares that no matter how profound we may seem, there is something broader and better. It makes us at least see in the Christ a helper, a teacher, a salvation if we will but take it in its broadest and highest and best light, not in the narrow limitations of selfishness, not with the suggestion that we can cast our sins upon him and have them forgiven, but in the broad sense that we can have the right to forgive ourselves by giving up that which caused us to fall, by rising into that altitude of the Christ principle. It does not say that when you are asked for food that you shall give a stone and then ask Christ to forgive you for it. It teaches that by our deeds and not by our creeds shall we be known. It teaches the broadest sense of that truth that shall alone make us the emblems of the highest religion, and if we want all that a Christ can teach us, we must reach the altitudes from which we can see the real light of high and holy truth as given in the infinite spirit that was before Abraham and is now. What shall we do to learn this lesson? We must gather in all that we can of the great truths of the past and present; receive into our souls the solemn suggestion that the prophecy of all past time is ours if we will use it; that the opportunity of all future time is ours if we will accept it, and that the only way by which we can profit by the past and accept of the future is by grasping that most precious, that most sacred of all truths now, and that if we wish to realize the great meaning of Christ, if we wish to do anything we should say at this present hour, I am a responsible being, here with the knowledge and the light that this divine character and others have cast upon me; I come from all that is past and I journey to all that is in the future; I am living now, the present is my golden opportunity of making for myself one more light, one more truth for the world and its people in which I live.

Then comes the solemn meaning of death. But we are told in this same chapter that death availeth not to those who grasp the highest truth. That we are to look on that as a mere temporary change, a dropping of this physical body. We should learn to count death as simply a change, a transition from this to some other world. If you were traveling out of this city to-night over one of our great railways and should come to a trestle and go speeding across, would you feel that you had changed because of this? No, you would know that you had only crossed the trestle, a simple midnight journey, and then you would go on the same person, the same individual. You had not gone through a mysterious and marvelous change. But perhaps before you went away you left some garment behind you. Would you think of that as a part of yourself, without which your being would not be complete? No, you would think of that as something discarded, as something you did not want. So when you cross the narrow trestle of eternity and find yourself in the great world beyond, you will have left the garment which you have worn here, this physical body, behind you. How true the picture is. We are born, we struggle, we weep. We center our heart's affection upon certain individuals; we grasp them with our eager hands and they are full of ashes and dust, and we scatter the ashes and turn sorrowfully from them. We see something else that catches our affections and we almost grasp it, but it eludes us, and we stand behind in the mist and the silence, and we gaze out into the sea of the future. Our eyes cannot see to the boats across and so we are uncertain, we do not know; but the boatman comes, he is silent and he places his finger upon his lips; we cannot turn back, the pathway by which we have come is ours no more; we enter the silent boat, we sit down and the noiseless oars are dipped into the swelling tide and we go away from what we have known into the dim gray mist of the night. But lo, the light shines and the stars come out and we see the compass and the boat, and while we are watching it the shore grows plain and the fog of our uncertainty rises. There is life and there are friends and there is the City Celestial, and at its gates are the faces of those we loved and of those who are dear to us, and we drop the garments that we have borne with us into the swelling tide, and they are gone forever. And lo, we step from out the little boat into the Beulah land of God's eternal City. And standing there and looking backward from where we have come and forward to what we shall be in the future, we recognize the great meaning of the words, I am an immortal soul; I have been through all time; I know I am something that is part with all this; I have crossed the bridge, I have rowed in the boat; I am the same individual, I am. And with this word upon our lips we begin to recognize that we are something to that infinite and eternal father who has through all time been part with us, and then a new meaning of that wonderful expression of Christ comes to us of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. We grasp our hands together, we clasp them close and our hearts overflow with the new meaning that has come to us of that great truth, and then we say, as said him of old, that all men are brothers and God the universal Father, and as we give utterance to this we hear the song of praise and joy and triumph and we see the shining face of the great teacher who said, "Before Abraham was, I am, and still am through all time, and shadow and death."

CONSOLATION.

To Mrs. M. H.

Dear heart, he does not heed your tears,
He whose pale clay lies pulseless here;
For him the gates of life have opened wide,
Death is not death with heav'n so near.

Into the larger, truer life,
Through the white gates we once had tho't so dark,
He has but passed with eager, hast'ning feet,
And song that shames the earth-bound lark.

From his freed soul have fallen the gyves
That held him fainting in his house of clay,
And like a bird unfettered speeds he now
Into the brighter air of heaven's day.

No more shall pain and sorrow mark
With moan, and sigh the path he treads for aye;
No more shall earth's dark cloud and storm obscure
The light that shines for him alway.

And this pale form, so still and lifeless now,
We'll lay away beneath the springing sod,
With tender hands, because it once was his,
Knowing that he himself now walks with God,

In a fair world of joy, so near
That you may almost feel its vital breath;
May almost clasp the living, loving hands,
That reach to you beyond the veil called death.

And through the veil so thinly drawn
Between this world of sense and heaven's own,
You'll see his face in tender smiling bent,
And hear again the voice beloved and known.

Then do not weep for him, dear heart,
Your tears alone can grieve his spirit now;
But humbly, with a heart of hope and trust,
Unto the changeless edict bow.

RELIGION--POLITICS.

A Freethinker Shelved on Account of His Views.

To the Editor:—The inclosed article appeared in a secular newspaper in our neighboring city of Canal Dover, Ohio. I think the article too good to receive only a limited circulation. The writer is an ex-soldier, who lost a leg in the service of his country during the war of the rebellion; but our good Christian people defeated him for Mayor, on account of his religious views.

C. H. MATHEWS.

New Philadelphia, Ohio.

The following observations grow out out of statements made by some of our citizens during the present mayorship contest, in regard to my religious views. I was called a infidel, agnostic, etc., and was imputed to be against the churches.

To these contentions I will say, that I am in good fellowship with the social and benevolent functions of the church so far as they relate to our own great and glorious country. Millions for the poor and oppressed of our own country, but not one dollar for the alienation of foreign people from their native religion to that of Christianity. That is only a shift from one superstition to another. The golden rule is good. Confucius stated it centuries before Jesus was born. It was good then, and it is still good. I cherish it. The morals and education of a nation are the nation's strength; but we must not confound the morals of a man or a nation, with the religion of the man or nation.

Concerning my position with regard to revealed religion, I beg leave to make a few observations about the positions of some of the noted churchmen of the present day: Rev. Mr. Cadman, of New York, Methodist, before an audience of 400 preachers, Bishop Andrews included, made the statement that "The inerrancy and infallibility of the Bible are no longer possible of belief among reasoning men." The proposition was applauded. He further said that "By the new construction of the truth of such Bible stories as Jonah and the whale; the fate of Lot's wife; Elijah's ascension; the age of Methuselah (by Bible chronology he lived 100 years after Noah's flood); Daniel in the lion's den; God's speaking with Moses out of the burning bush, are all questioned." Doctors Briggs, Smith, McGiffert and Thomas were pushed out of the church because they denied the authenticity and inspiration of these and like Bible stories. Rabbi Fleischer, of Boston, in an address delivered in Cleveland, March 19, 1899, said: "The God of our fathers is outgrown, and we have not yet found the greater God who will win our homage and our children's."

"The God of our fathers who made the world in six days and rested on the seventh is no longer a worshipful God to the generation which accepts the theory of evolution. We need a greater God, one that fits our new cosmology, one that fills in the whole of our enlarged horizon."

Dr. Lyman Abbot declares the story of the flood to be unscientific and untrue. The science of geology declares the same thing. Dr. Hillis recently resigned from the Presbyterian Church because he could not endorse the cruel creed of that church in respect to foreordination, predestination and consequent infant damnation. He says in part: "While we have been discussing the nature of inspiration and petty critical problems, the great world, weary and broken-hearted and choked with mist and fog, have been asking whether or not there is a personal God." Dr. Parkhurst in a recent sermon declared: "Amending the old creed will not meet the necessities of the case. Better give it a dignified place in a museum for what it is, than hack it to pieces and revamp it for what it is not. Any man who should become a father for the joy and glory he would use in burning and racking his own offspring, deliberately creating a child with a view to the agony with which he was going to torture it, would be chased from the earth as a fiend; yet such a belief is printed on the flag beneath which the Presbyterian army is marching. Men are staying out because it is there and men are going out because it is there."

What is the meaning of all this? It means that the scientific men of to-day no longer believe in the inspiration of the Bible, and that they reject all the cruel and unreasonable dogmas of the Christian and Jewish systems of religion. To me personally, these observations are not new; but they confirm what has been a settled conviction in my mind for years past. It is too late in the day to ostracise and condemn men on account of their religious opinions. I deny that belief is important. Acts and works are important. A man believes as he must. He cannot believe a thing relating to the future simply because some one tells him to believe. If you doubt this, try to believe, for just ten minutes, that the great God of the Hindoos, Bramah, is the only true God, and that the Vedas, the Hindoo Bible, is the real word of life. If you cannot do this, then my proposition is proven.

Horace Greeley, in the May number of the New York Tribune, 1838, the year in which the Vedas was translated into English, says: "There is no doctrine of Christianity which has not been anticipated by Vedas. They have all the doctrines of Christianity." And that old heathen Bible was written two thousand years before a line of the Christian doctrine was penned. Do I believe in a God? Yes; if I be allowed to give my own definition. But I do not believe in the vacillating and cruel God of the Jewish Bible. He is said to be "without body or parts;" under that definition I can form no idea about him, and consequently can form no belief about him. I say vacillating, because he created some people, and when he saw that they were not acting as he supposed they would, he repented that he had made them, and thinking he could do better the next time, he brought on a flood and drowned them—all but eight persons. Again, in the threatened destruction of Sodom, Jehovah wanted to destroy them all, but Abraham talked him out of it; and it was finally agreed that if ten righteous persons could be found in the city it should be spared.

In conclusion, I will say, that the only difference between me and many other citizens of Canal Dover on these questions is, that I have been outspoken about them while others have chosen to be skeptics under cover. If the Bible is the word of God, then it cannot be damaged by criticism; if it is not, then the people should be informed as to what it really is. It would afford me a pleasure to discuss the question in a friendly way, with any minister or layman resident of our city. Very respectfully,

A. C. NARAGON.

ANOTHER VIEW.

Concerning Jesus of Nazareth.

HE WAS AN ORDINARY SORT OF A FELLOW, AND OUGHT TO HAVE BEEN MARRIED, AND THUS IN A MEASURE ROUNDED OUT HIS LIFE.

Very unreasonable it seems to me is the talk indulged in [as set forth in the New York Journal] of late about walking in the footsteps of Christ—about doing as he did when he was on earth, or as he would do if he were here now.

Two opinions prevail respecting Christ. One is that he was a man, the other that he was God in the guise of a man. With either of these opinions accepted, the unreasonableness appears of making him our exemplar and seeking to pattern after him in the conduct of life.

If Christ was God, the mighty maker and upholder of the universe, then, he is too exalted for us to imitate; too far removed from us in his nature and attributes. One finite being may imitate another, no matter how great his excellence, but the finite may not hope to imitate the infinite. The possibility of such a thing is precluded by the measureless difference between them.

Those who claim that Christ was God say, for instance, that he was superior to natural law; that, when he wanted bread for the multitude, he took one loaf and multiplied it into as many hundreds or thousands of loaves as the exigencies of the case required; that when he needed money for any particular purpose he found the requisite sum in a fish's mouth, or wherever he willed to find it; that he healed the sick who were dying, and raised the dead where decomposition was far advanced; that he stilled the tempest when upon the water or rode upon the air as easily as he trod the paths of his Nazareth home. If these things were so, what folly it is for us to be setting him up as our exemplar and trying to copy after him in his brief but marvelous career.

The same thing appears when the other opinion is accepted that Christ was a man—a man of lofty mien and purpose, but still, in every sense of the word, a man—a reformer in the Jewish church, who incurred the displeasure of the authorities in his work, and who was put to death by them in accordance with the laws of the church that he vainly sought to reform. Nineteen hundred years have passed since this reformer appeared. The times in which he lived, therefore, were comparatively primitive and the condition of things which obtained in society then was antipodal of what it is now. If the world progresses any it is hard to see how a man of the first century could be a model for those of the nineteenth century, and especially their model par excellence.

But the fact that we would emphasize in this connection is that Christ died a young man and unmarried. A young man, he might be an exemplar for the younger portion of the community, but not for the middle-aged or those in advanced and declining life, the reason being that maturing years had not yet come upon him, the years that alone could have fitted him for such a service.

An unmarried man, his life, of course, was fractional and incomplete. Though never so correct in the limited relations he sustained to others, he must have lacked the finished fulness of experience that only married people attain and without which the well-rounded life does not come, nor the full-orbed character. The part of the community that is most in need of an exemplar is the married part—the men and women who have families to care for and who are striving as best they may to bring up their children in such a way that honor and happiness may await them. To be the exemplar of mankind Christ must needs have been a married man, who looked well and successfully to the affairs of his household.

OPPOSED BY JESUITS

American Rule in the Philippines Distasteful to the Order.

FREE SPEECH AND PRESS TABOOED — CORRESPONDENCE OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.

Manila, April 15.—The most sensational of the events of the past week has been the general distribution by the Jesuits of a pamphlet in which is set forth "truths which Christians must observe." Among the things most strongly condemned in this pamphlet are religious tolerance and recognition of civil marriage. Consequently this act of the Jesuits is considered by many to be an attack upon the American administration. The pamphlet in question says:

"1. The commands of the church must be obeyed in the same manner as the law of God.

"2 You must subject your own judgment to that of the church and think exactly as the church thinks, for the church cannot be overcome.

"3. You must reject and condemn the Masonic sect, so frequently rejected and condemned by the supreme pontiffs.

"4. You must also reject and condemn liberty of worship, liberty of the press, liberty of thought and the other liberties of perdition condemned and rejected by the church.

"5. You must also reject and condemn liberalism and also modern progress and civilization as being false progress and false civilization.

MUST ABOMINATE CIVIL MARRIAGE.

"6. You must utterly abominate civil marriage and regard it as pure concubinage.

"7. You must also condemn and reject the interference of the civil authorities in any ecclesiastical affairs, so much in vogue nowadays.

"8. Finally, you must hold the belief that the church by its origin has a divine and supernatural authority, and is, moreover, superior to the civil authority, and reject and condemn the doctrine that the church is independent or ought to separate itself from the state. Children must be brought up in the above views, condemning whatever the church condemns; and children must be educated solely in Catholic schools, by genuinely Catholic teachers, and not on any account in unsectarian schools, which are strictly forbidden by the church."

The foregoing commands are backed by many quotations from the Bible, ecclesiasticals, syllabus and letters from different popes. This pamphlet was issued without duly expressing church authority, and until the organ of the Roman Catholic church in Manila, a Spanish newspaper called the Liberasjus, admitted the fact that the Jesuits had published, and with every right, the pamphlet in question, considerable doubt was entertained as to its authority.

TO MR. AND MRS. O. G. HURSEN.

We know not till we separate from those we dearly love,
Till our darlings go in spirit to a home
just up above,
Just how deeply and how lovely are their happy faces grown,
Till we lose their precious presence and are plodding on alone.

Oh, how sudden came the parting of a family one day,
When the angel of transition caught
two children at their play
And uplifted their sweet spirits from the parent hearts below,
And just left them sorely bleeding for the darlings they loved so.

Little Ethel was the eldest, and she seemed to know the way,
And no doubt when angels met them
she was clinging to "O. K.";
'Twas the name by which all knew him in his happy earthly home,
And the angels have his record up in heaven's golden dome.

Though the hearts below are bleeding from the wounds inflicted there,
Both the darlings are enraptured with the home they found so fair,
And will know the time for watching and for waiting at the door
For their papa and their mamma, and for Glennie to pass o'er.

PARENTAL REVERIE.

Yes, I'll treasure every garment that my Ethel used to wear;
All the playthings, little dishes and this tiny lock of hair;
Her little desk of trinkets where she spent such happy hours,
And the little doll she treasured and oft decked with pretty flowers,
Shall be kept from dust and mildew till the angels come for me;
Till I close my eyes in slumber that will set my spirit free.

There are other things I treasure, for they bring me untold joy;
All the clothing and the playthings of my darling little boy;
Those arms that once caressed me,
those lips that pressed my cheek,
In my soul will live forever, to my spirit ever speak,
When I touch the things he handled in his daily round of play,
And I'll live my life all over with my darling boy "O. K."

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR.

We promised in our last letter to tell you how the sun of your system of worlds came into being; and when we tell you this you will know how all other suns come to be. Suns are forming to-day just the same as they eternally have been and just as they eternally will.

Suns are formed, or grow, within the great eternal sea of atoms. Eternity might be likened to the ocean, except that it has neither beginning nor end; it is limitless.

"Well," you ask, "why don't you tell us something new? We already know that."

There is nothing new, neither within the heavens nor upon the earths. Everything is as old as eternity itself. Everything always has existed and always will. The sun existed before it became a body of light, but it existed in the form of atoms. Now, in order to make ourselves understood, we must first tell you all about the atom. All eternity is composed of the male and female principles, positive and negative, spirit and matter; but the very lowest, first forms in existence, have the two principles combined in one form; and this is true of the atoms. Each atom is a tiny speck of pure flame—or spirit or magnetism which ever you may be pleased to call it—surrounded and covered by matter. The spirit within the heart of the atom is the female principle; that which covers and conceals it is the male principle. Now these can be called by any other names that one may choose—force and matter, potentialities and so forth—but we think that male and female principles, positive and negative, more exactly expresses the truth and can be better understood by the ordinary reader—and the ordinary or common people are the ones we are talking too, the uncommon people do not need instruction and hardly ever change their minds, no matter who talks.

In earth life these atoms are invisible, for they are so ethereal in their nature that they belong to the octave above human sight, but they are distinctly visible to us here within the celestial life. Now atoms are never at rest, for nothing remains statu quo, but they are in constant motion. In fact each tiny atom is revolving in its own particular orbit. The little flame or spirit within the heart of the atom is a magnet, or magnetic attraction. The law of this magnetic attraction is to hold or grasp each other as closely as possible, and soon a body, or small globe is formed. This is what we denominate growth within the eternal sea of atoms. Now countless suns are forming, or growing, at all times; ever have been and ever will be. As this small globe revolves, it continually attracts and holds other atoms—and all atoms that are anywhere within its attractive power—its size, together with its orbit constantly increases, and all eternity is before it. It has no need of hurry—no more have the angels and spirits, and earthly men and women would not hurry if they were exceedingly wise.

At length, after many ages, this body of atoms has become very large and heavy, its own weight and motion have compacted it and at this epoch of its growth it has no light of its own, it has but one body or form which, as I have already shown, is the first or primary form, containing the male and female principles, equally, within the one form; and this is true of all first or primary forms whatever, as every naturalist well understands. When this body has reached a certain stage of size and weight, it has reached what may be called a state of maturity, it is ready to propagate.

Now, this first, or primary form, is not hard or compact like your earth, but more like the soft jelly-fish; it is smooth and round, or egg-shaped. Presently its size is so enormous that it cannot bear its own weight, and its whirling motion loosens an outer crust which naturally falls away from it, the inner globe escaping, as it were, from its shell. Now this ring which it has thrown off is repelled by the motion of the first body to a certain distance, and yet the attractive power of the first body holds the second at a proper distance. This ring, by what is called centripetal power or attraction, gathers itself together at its central point and thus becomes an independent globe, but because it gathers itself together at its centre its crust is all ragged and broken, in other words wrinkled and uneven; great yawning chasms and mountain ridges; yet at this time it is comparatively soft and warm.

Now we might say that this first ring or globe is the sun's first child. The sun keeps on gathering and growing as before, circling in its own orbit, which is continually enlarging. The baby world follows on as fast as possible, but its orbit is smaller, for it is small compared to its parent. The first globe, at length, throws off another ring, and thus it continues to do until it has thrown off seven. It has now become too hard and old to throw off any more and is preparing for a great change.

Up to this time the sun had no light except a very pale, amber light, caused by the magnetic or spiritual principle within it, and, of course, its baby worlds emitted about the same; the light being somewhat like phosphorus. But the sun was now old and must die or separate, disintegrate, change; that being the natural law of its chemical construction; so, as the countless ages wore on, it gradually gave up every particle of its spiritual or magnetic flame. The body of matter which the spirit had left being now as black as night, but the spirit, as all must understand, was the little magnetic flame at the heart of each atom, still retained the same form and size as before, also the black dead body of matter. But nothing is dead. Nothing does die. It was simply a change that a higher state of things might exist.

Now the spiritual flame shot forth into space until it was millions of miles away from its material body. Now, behold, a great event! The first or primary form had separated and become two forms, one the positive and one the negative, male and female principles, separated, the positive force forever attracting the negative, both these substances being elementary or elements.

Now that these two bodies are exactly opposite each other, forever holding each other in exact balance, and they roll in their orbits like a double wheel—a dual globe, the spiritual or magnetic principle forever setting fire to the carboniferous globe, causing a continual burst of glorious, flaming light and heat; great waves of magnetism, or spirit, are forever flowing toward the carboniferous globe and as the bursting flames shoot forth, every ray, together with the heat is gathered up by the other; and, after chemical transmutation, is sent back again in the before mentioned magnetic waves. Now this is what constitutes the light and heat of the sun. The seven rings which it threw off previous to the change are now bathed in heat, light and magnetism, or spirit. They, in consequence, congeal and harden or are baked into rock; and, in our next letter we will tell you more about it.

Now this is no idle speculation; and my son knows no more about it than others do; but, I am a spirit and I do know. If it were not so I would on no account take the trouble to write so great a falsehood. But I have said that I would try to prove each statement that I made. We can only do this by appealing to the reason of those who read.

If all planets were formed separately, and in the same manner, from star dust, nebulae, swirling vortex and so forth, why are some burning light, while others are dark, having no light of their own?

Some talk very learnedly about vibration, or light and heat being caused by vibrations. They wind themselves all up in vibrations and don't know what they are talking about when they get through; and we agree with a former writer when he said, "Vibratory moonshine!" They are vibratory moonshiners. There is, certainly, a vibratory law; but it never was the cause of light and heat. Some will have it that vibration is the cause of all things. Others will have evolution running alone; and thus each one to his hobby. It is all right enough until one learns better, but when you grasp one law in one hand, look out that you have its counterpart in the other. No law runs alone throughout the universe—but its complement, whether hidden or otherwise, is always with it and must be taken into account. A great analogical chain runs through all nature.

Now we do not expect that all will believe what we have written. Few believed Galileo when he declared that the earth was a globe and revolved in its orbit, but now a man would be considered a fool who did not. It really is not a matter of belief but an established fact.

Presently, some astronomers will step out of the beaten track and declare that the sun is a dual body of chemical and elementary principles, and in a hundred years from the present time anyone holding the old idea that it was simply one large body, or earth, will be laughed at as one not up to the times; and, thus the world moves on as all things move on, as the sun moved on.

The Christian world to-day has a great he God without a she; but the God of nature, or the real God, is he and she forever at oneness; and nature, in all her varied methods, never evolutes into one great hybrid neither male nor female—neither is sex a matter of accident but a great eternal law in nature; and, sometime, we will tell you all about this law; yet, we will here say, that every atom in the universe is male and female united in oneness at the very foundation of all that exists, and without the two principles in equal proportion, nothing can exist or be created. It is creation itself; or, God if you will.

The sun appears, to those of earth, as one body, when it is really two in one. It is a type of the angelic world. The true male and female are blended into oneness, yet they are two distinct bodies making one perfect or complete angel, constantly emitting rays of wisdom, love and truth, and forever performing all manner of good works.

Earthly marriage is the type of the heavenly union—and you have an ancient saying, "That they twain shall be one flesh," or one; and if this is true of earth, it is, in a higher degree—or a higher plane of evolution—also true.

So weep not lonely, desolate ones of earth. A little while and the joys of a true union will be yours. A loving companion awaits you somewhere, and you will surely meet and go hand in hand throughout eternity together. The universe is not governed by accident but by eternal, underlying laws or principles which never vary in their results; neither do we speculate when we tell you from positive knowledge and experience—tell you things as we have actually found them.

When friend Robert came here he did not believe in a future state of being; but he has found that there is. When I came here, I had not believed in a future state, but thought if there were one, I should prefer to live a single life. I had become somewhat tired of matrimony and its consequent cares and anxieties, having had two wives and many children. I went on alone for a while, but the great, eternal law soon confronted me to my happiness and contentment. The details of all this I have already given in "The Discovered Country," and no romances of earth can exceed, or compare, with those of the celestial life.

Now anyone can readily see that if the light and heat of the sun was simply caused by vibratory action, that all the planets, together with your earth, would be suns of more or less magnitude; but, such is not the case. The planets simply shine with reflected light, that is, they reflect the light of the sun which is shining upon them, and all these reflected rays are again returned to the sun to be absorbed within her vast laboratory, where they return to their former chemical condition—once more sent forth in great magnetic waves to the black body, or the counterpart, again bursting forth into blazing glory, again darting through space to warm and vivify the planets which, as we have shown, are the children of the sun, together with the grand-children the moons which the planets have thrown off.

Anyone can see by this that moons are not old, worn-out worlds, but baby worlds—the grand-children of the sun.

We do not expect to be credited at the present time. Many will laugh; others will sneer; some will say that we are spirits of a low grade and very ignorant; others, that we are lying spirits; nevertheless this will not alter or change great eternal laws or truths; and, when that renowned and great mind, which now bears the name of Hudson Tuttle, comes here, we shall laugh and shake hands and be glad to meet each other. I will introduce him to my Helena and ask him, with a smile, if he thinks she has become less a woman than formerly when she was on earth?

We here, in the celestial life, love this great and good man. He has accomplished an immense amount of good—or the angelic world working through him; almost more than any other man of the present time of the earth, and, really, many of us here feel impatient of the delay. How we long to take him by the hand, show him our wives, our homes, as well as the animal life that exists here; honor him as he deserves honor; at the same time we shall say to him: Dear Mr. Tuttle, all truth cannot be given to earth through one medium or channel, but through each and all avenues that we are able to make use of.

Years ago, when you were a sensitive lad, all the truth possible to give to earth, at that time was given. The world could scarcely bear even that. As you grew older, coming into man's estate, you became more positive; being the male, or positive element, spirits found it more difficult, and many of the ideas you now entertain were imbibed in early childhood, and you, yourself, know, how hard it is to overcome such fixed ideas. Nothing, now, can change them but transition; and it is well for all, and the world at large, that transition comes to them sooner or later, else all progress would be at an end. Nothing can change fixed ideas but actual experience. If I had not had this experience—if I did not positively know by actual contact with all that I have thus far related—I would never take the time and trouble to control the sensitive whom I use as I now do. I desire to give truth to the world, and to do good, as much as ever you did. You have given to the world an immense amount of truth, but not all the truth. There is, really, much more to be known, and others now must be made use of. So do not clog our wheels, for many take every word that falls from your lips or pen, as unchangeable, eternal truth. It is better to have been Hudson Tuttle than to have been Abraham Lincoln. Yet both were needed.

One emancipated the minds—the other the bodies of men. All honor be to their names!

ALONG EARTH'S ROUGHEST WAYS.

Some people sneer at what is here
As if, sometime, somewhere
They'd lived upon some other sphere
More excellent and fair—
As if, through false pretenses, you
Or I had basely led them to Desert contentment there.

Why stay to hear or heed the cries—
Of bitterness they raise?
There's little even in the skies
That might evoke their praise!
For him who seeks with heart aglow
Fair flowers in abundance grow
Along earth's roughest ways.

THE INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

What Is the Secret of the Influence of Christianity Over the Minds of Men? Shown by J. S. Loveland.

In a recent publication I read the following words: "Christianity is an astounding phenomenon in the world, and such a phenomenon swaying the scepter over all enlightened nations must have originated from nothing, or it must have had a divine founder. * * * Therefore, if one would know the nature and divine potency of the Christian religion, let him look to the life and teachings of Jesus, to the non-manipulated gospels and epistles, and to the Christian faith and practices of the first three centuries."

By way of preface, it might be said that Christianity is no more "astounding phenomenon" than Judaism, Buddhism, Islamism, or any other of the great religions of the world; and no more calls for a "divine founder" than the others. Moreover, there is no more evidence of the divinity of Jesus than of Buddha. It is fable in both cases.

But the quotation is introduced as showing the gross superstition existing respecting the influence of Christianity among persons in some respects intelligent and liberal. Even in the ranks of the Spiritualists can be found many, who have not as yet outgrown the superstition of church teaching and early impressions. The stereotyped notions and cant phrases of the old church are more potential with them than all the demonstrations of modern science and scholarship. And such is their hallucination that they cannot see the absurdity of their position. The veriest infidel of the old school cannot exceed them in their denunciation of the church, and then they will turn about and use the stereotyped phrases and arguments of the church in eulogy of Christianity. Their defense is that churchianity and Christianity are not the same.

But, if the church does not embody Christianity, what does? If the church has not transmitted it down through the centuries, what has? And, if the church, in its institutions and activities, is not the summing up of the influence of Christianity upon the world, where under heaven are we to find that influence? If Christianity has not been embodied in the church, for nineteen centuries, where has it been? Has it been hidden away in some outside locality? The simple, common-sense statement is this: The principles of Christianity have been embodied in the creeds of the church, and its life, has been the influence of those principles upon humanity. We must, of course, allow for modifications of that influence growing out of race characteristics. For instance, we should find considerable differences between a church made up from negro converts and those from the cultured Greeks. In fact, we will find race characteristics to largely modify any form of religion. And this fact will go a long way in explaining much that is claimed as the result of Christian influence. The writer, quoted above, tells of Christianity as "swaying the scepter over all the enlightened nations." So also it sways the scepter over Abyssinia, and has for centuries. Why is it not on a par with England, or the United States? Because it belongs to another race of men.

THE SECRET OF CHRISTIANITY'S INFLUENCE.

What is the secret of the influence of Christianity over the minds of men? I have already suggested that that influence is greatly exaggerated; and I submit that for all that science has done and will do for man we are not, in the slightest degree, indebted to Christianity. The Greeks had started on the path of scientific progress before our era, and Archimedes alone has been credited with some seventy inventions. The entire mechanism of the world is an evolution of his discovery of the power of the lever. The table of Pythagoras, the geometry of Euclid, and the astronomy of Ptolemy, Eratosthenes and others owe nothing to Christianity. They preceded it a long time. And coming down to our own time, its wonderful discoveries owe nothing to the Christian religion. On the contrary, we are confronted with the incontrovertible fact that early Christianity destroyed the Greek civilization and has been the bitter and implacable opposer of science and every discovery which has tended to human advancement. And it has persecuted to the death those who have sought to uplift the race and improve its conditions. Instead of Christianity being the uplifter of man, it is man who has lifted it from the terrible dark ages which it created, and placed it in the comparatively respectable position in which it stands to-day. Man has advanced in spite of Christianity, not because of it.

Nor is the influence of Christianity due to its superior morality. For ages Christians claimed the so-called Golden Rule as having been original with Jesus. But it is now known to have been a common precept among the Jews of his time, and to have been published five hundred years at least before. Mercy, love and kindness had been taught long before Jesus. There is nothing true and valuable but what existed before the advent of Christianity. Rabbi Wise, a liberal Jew, says, "All the religious precepts expressed in the gospels, and a good many more, are derived from the Old Testament. * * * The universal, religious and ethical element of Christianity has no connection whatever with Jesus or his Apostles, with the gospel or the gospel story; it exists independent of any person or story." Hence, the most that Christianity can claim is that it has sanctioned the ethical precepts existing long prior to its advent. Some of its additions to the moral code are decidedly immoral. So far as the practical application of ethical principles is concerned, Christianity has nothing to boast of over other religions, and especially over Judaism from which it has borrowed so much. Great boasts are made over the charities which it is assumed, especially distinguish Christianity. We are pointed to hospitals, infirmaries and poor-houses as evidences of the divinity of Christianity. The best illustration of all this vast manifestation of so-called charity is found in Pollock's description of the hypocrite: "With one hand he put a penny in the urn of poverty, and with the other he took a shilling out." This is precisely what Christianity, and the nations which are swayed by it are doing. By means of infamous and unjust laws they rob the masses, and then demand glory for the soup-houses, etc., by which some are saved from starvation. All these Christian charities are simply monuments of the injustice and robbery of the system. No charity would be needed where justice was done. Let Christianity inaugurate Justice in human government and society, and all need for charity will be at an end. All will possess equal rights and privileges.

Nor can we attribute the influence of Christianity to its devotion to God and the sufferings of its martyrs. Christianity and Judaism worship the same Jehovah. Jews have died as martyrs as bravely as ever Christians have done. For two thousand years and more, they have been trodden under foot because of their fidelity to the worship of Jehovah. They have been unable to believe that one of their nation was the "only begotten son" of the Deity, and for this flagrant crime Christianity has followed them, and still follows them, with a vengeance as relentless as the wrath of its God toward the wicked. So far as devotion to their Gods is concerned there is but little difference in the various nations of men. But that devotion declines just in proportion to their progress in scientific culture.

What then is the secret of its influence? In a general sense, we might say that it was ignorance, but this would not be a specific or understandable answer. Hence, I submit that its influence has been, and still is, largely the result of the monstrous falsehood of its fundamental principles. Secure a truthful perception of those teachings and the influence ceases entirely. In fact, Christianity, as a reality, disappears. The central, the basic doctrine of Christianity is the incarnation of God in man by the process of a "miraculous conception."

The child Jesus was both God and man. This incarnation was for the purpose of making an atonement for sin, as all the race had become involved in damnatory guilt through the act of Adam their federal head. This God-man, by his death on the cross, made a full expiation for that sin. He then rose from the grave as the "first fruit," and the guarantee of the final resurrection of all mankind. He then ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand of God the Father as intercessor for man.

All intelligent persons know that the epistles of Paul are the oldest Christian writings in existence, and it is Paul who taught these fundamental doctrines, and the gospels were made up to confirm these teachings of Paul, who is the real author of Christianity. Now, we know that all this miraculousness is purely fable. But you abstract all this fabulous mythology from the New Testament, and what have you left? Essentially nothing. At the utmost, there is a hazy vision of a possible Jewish enthusiast, pretending to be the Messiah, calling around him a few ignorant followers for a few months, and then being executed by the Roman Procurator. As Brigham Young built up Mormonism on Joseph Smith, so Paul may be supposed to have built up Christianity upon an equally false pretension. But take away from the memory of Joe Smith the fable of the "golden plates," and where would Mormonism be? So take from the traditions the resurrection of Jesus, and where would Christianity be? Nowhere. The resurrection proves the incarnation and all the related doctrines I have mentioned, and they constitute the Christian system.

This doctrine of divine incarnation made a powerful appeal to the Aryan branch of humanity. The Hindoo theology has its many incarnations of Vishnu, and especially of Krishna. Egypt had its incarnations and resurrections of Gods. And Greece, if possible, surpassed all the other branches of the Aryan stock. It is only upon the Aryans that Christianity has made any great or permanent impression. Semitism has been, save in individual instances, impervious to it. God incarnate is to them a monstrosity; hence, Jews and Arabs have alike rejected and opposed it. The earliest glimpse of the Aryan reveals him a nature worshiper. Gradually natural objects, as the sun, moon, firmament, etc., were transformed into incarnations of gods and goddesses. But as man's reason evolved, the numerous gods gave place to three principal ones, and these three were finally resolved into one of threefold manifestations. Farther thought develops what is termed the Divine Immanence, or God in the universe instead of sitting upon it. And as an inevitable inference Pantheism becomes the conclusion of the highest type of Aryan philosophy. It has got back to nature worship, though on a higher and grander style than the Hindoo of six thousand years ago.

The child mind seeks sympathetic companionship in its sports, and sympathetic pity and comfort in its sorrows. As Henry C. Wright used to say, it wants to be "cuddled." Its God must be human. So also the race in its childhood demanded a human God—an incarnate one. It demands one that can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities, "having been tempted in all points like ourselves." He will wipe the tears from our eyes, and bind up the broken-hearted, and comfort those that mourn. This is the kind of God which childhood demands, and this is the incarnate God of Christianity. He is on the level of human weakness, and yet sits upon the throne of Deity. He was bruised for our iniquities, and tasted death for every man. No wonder that a religion should be influential which so exactly fitted the idiosyncrasies of the most irrepressible type of humanity in its childish and youthful period. Until it attains manhood it will be Christian, and the stupendous falsehoods manufactured by the founders will be the doctrines avowed in the creeds and believed by the people.

But childhood is not only credulous and sympathetically weak, but it is also vindictively selfish. Most potently does Christianity appeal to this selfishness. There is a heaven to gain and a hell to escape. The loving, pitying Jesus will lead those who believe in him into green pastures and by the side of still waters, but to the unbelieving he will say "Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." The wicked will pray for "rocks and mountains to fall on them" to hide them from the "wrath of the Lamb." The saved, the elect will be "cuddled" in Abraham's bosom, while the unsaved are pitchforked by Satan into the fire that is not quenched, and preyed upon by the worm that never dies. The hopes, the fears, the selfish pride of humanity are appealed to by Christianity more potently than by any other world religion except Mohammedanism, and that is borrowed in part from Christianity. It has "swayed" the nations with tremendous power but its sway has weakened just in proportion as man has evolved from credulous childhood to the stature of manhood.

But the most potent source of Christian influence has been the workings of suggestive or sympathetic hypnotism, including mediumship. But all these subtle and potent forces have been used in entire ignorance of their real nature. Much is said and written about the Spiritualism of the Bible. But neither Jews nor Christians had any conception of what we term Spiritualism or mediumship. The early Christians had neither circles nor mediums; nor had any notion of communication with their departed friends. But the mediumistic temperament existed all the same, and some of the phases of mediumship would of necessity occur, but they would not be understood, and of course would be most grievously misinterpreted. We know that all medium phenomena are in harmony with natural law. Christianity ascribed them all to miracle. Spirit messengers were God's angels, and sent by him. Sleep has been a mystery to man. Because in sleep he has dreamed. Dreamed of his dead friends as alive and talking to him. He also dreamed of the Gods and their angels as appearing to him. On the dreams of one Joseph the Jewish nation was substantially founded, and on the alleged dreaming of another Joseph rests the entire structure of Christianity. Great is the power of dreaming.

But wonderful as was natural sleep and its dreams, the hypnotic or magnetic sleep immensely surpassed it. Sometimes induced by the magnetic sympathy of companions, at others probably by spirits, and again self-induced, it became, in the estimation of the people the God-sleep. And a variety of processes were resorted to in order to produce it. These sleepers became clairvoyant, clairaudient, psychometric and telepathic; and hence, were regarded as the mouth-pieces of the gods. But another important feature of this sleep was that a state of extreme ecstasy was induced in the sleepers, and would be transmitted to those most in sympathy with them, and eventually the ecstatic condition would be induced without the trance. Moreover the trance condition could be reached without the insensibility of sleep. Old Balaam could go into the trance with his "eyes open." Eventually it was found that certain persons could develop the mediumistic condition in others, and also produce the ecstasy. They became the first priests. All this was largely developed prior to the advent of Christianity. But after that event it became more common, and the superstition in reference to it more intense. It was the operation of the Holy Ghost, and the developers were the imparters of that Ghost by the imposition of hands. This hypnotic suggestion, regarded as the working of the Holy Ghost, is the most potent and wide-spread influence of Christianity. And so long as men are ignorant of the natural law, so long will they be the slavish tools of Superstition. This "experience," as it is termed, is more potent than all the arguments which wisdom can construct. For it is the Lord Jesus Christ who gives the Holy Ghost, and who forgives sin, and he is the "only begotten son of God"—the crucified—the resurrected one. Indeed, the "experience," through hypnotic suggestion, includes, in the consciousness of the hallucinated converts, all the impossible miracles of the Christian system. Hence, I say that all the most potent influences of Christianity flow entirely from the monstrous falsehoods which it teaches. Take away the immaculate conception, the vicarious death—the bodily resurrection, and the interceding Divinity at the right hand of the Eternal Father, and the influence of Christianity becomes nil at once. There would be none so poor as to do it reverence. In fact, there would be no Christianity. There never was any Christianity only as these monstrous falsehoods have been embodied in a doctrinal system.

Paul, the first Christian writer, was the organizer of Christianity, and the author of its creed. Without the work and writings of Paul Christianity would never have had a historical existence, and the name of Jesus would have been as unknown as the thousands who are totally forgotten. It is not a man Jesus but a God Jesus which has so mightily influenced humanity. It is not an obscure Jewish enthusiast, repeating Jewish parables and moral precepts which has captivated the admiration and secured the homage of millions, but the God-man who forgives sin, rules heaven and earth and is the dread judge in the Great Day of Judgment and Eternal Doom. It is not a condemned revolutionist, suffering death on a Roman cross, which becomes the one grand spectacle for human and angel wonder and worship, but it is the expiatory victim, "in whom dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily," "tasting death for every man," that makes the cross the grand ensign of the Militant Church. Reduce the crucifixion of a man Jesus down to its real proportions, provided it ever transpired, and it falls very far below in sublimity the spectacle of Bruno in the flames. It is the glamor of Divinity which has given, and still gives to Christianity all the influence which it as a religion possesses. Other men have been ready to lay down their lives for their friends, but no one has founded a religion on Damon and Pythias.

The basis, the secret of Christian influence lies in the falsity of its fundamental doctrines. And the potency of that influence depends upon the superstitious ignorance of man. Hence, Christianity is limited to that period in human evolution when man is developing from the superstitious animalism of semi-civilization to the unfolded reason of genuine enlightenment. The process is a slow and painful one, both the individual and social man. But it goes on all the same, and the coming century will see a more rapid progress than ever before.

There is, however, another phase of Christian influence which I have not noticed in this article. And as it pertains especially to the first three centuries, I will devote to it another article.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

THE UNEASY GHOST WIRED A CALL.

The Mystery of a Nightly Message Sent Over a Private-Wire Line.

WAS A CALL FOR HELP—GIRL OPERATOR MURDERED AS SHE SAT AT THE INSTRUMENT.

Sometimes it happens that a newspaper reporter has an opportunity to go away on a brief trip for recreation. Such a reporter went to a suburb of Boston not long ago to enjoy a rest with a fortunate friend, who owns a fine old place, where the manner of his living is enough to make any man want to throw off the shackles of toil and do nothing all his life long, except "just be a millionaire." This lucky man having money enough to make "fads" enjoyable, has several, one of which at one time was amateur telegraphy.

"How are you doing in the telegraph business now?" asked the reporter while on a tour of inspection, and passing through a small office room. They had stopped at a telegrapher's table and an instrument shoved over into a corner and showing rusty and dusty evidence of disuse.

"That doesn't look as if I were doing a rushing practice, does it?" said the friend, nodding toward the table.

"That's why I asked. I thought you were going to achieve distinction in that line," said the reporter seriously, "for you seemed to have the inborn faculty. I have had more or less acquaintance with Edison, and I used to do things every now and then very much as I have seen him do them."

"I thought myself that was my best hold," he laughed, "but since I lived in this house, now three years, I have given it up. The man who occupied this house before me was a rich stockbroker and a crank. I may say that the house had remained unoccupied a long time before I took it. The former occupant built just beyond the main house a small office in which he placed an instrument and a private wire connected with his Boston office, and put in charge of it as operator a young woman about 25 years old. That was fifteen years ago.

"The girl was bright and interesting and of good family, but not especially pretty, and she was an orphan. There were stories that the broker, a widower with grown children, wanted to marry her, but his family opposed it so he was afraid to defy them. Like a great many men, he calculated the costs of such conflicts and hesitated for a long time before coming to a positive conclusion. When he finally got the courage, he got plenty of it, and very briefly and firmly one day he met his family at their house in town which he provided for them, and formally announced that on the 15th of the following month he would marry the young woman telegraph operator, then in his employ. Further, he would say that if they made no more trouble for him, he would give them their share of his estate, but if they insisted on interfering in matters which only concerned him and the woman in question, he would transfer all his property to her while he lived and make it impossible for them to have any part of it.

GREEDY HEIRS DISAPPOINTED.

"This was a crushing blow to their ambitions and when the father left the house there were such threats of what they would do as would have called for police action had they been of a lower strata of society. However, everything seemed to move along serenely, and the members of the family were so far reconciled to the inevitable that they came out to visit their father and incidentally to meet the young woman who was to be his wife. The older son, a spendthrift and disreputable chap of 25, who had been the leader of the opposition, was now quite as anxious to obtain his father's good will, and even went so far as to call two or three times on his future stepmother.

"One morning, about ten days before the wedding day, when the servant went to the young woman's room to call her to breakfast, she found her lying across the bed fully dressed. A hasty examination by the frightened maid revealed the fact that she was dead, and she at once notified the broker, who was starting for the train to town. It was noted that the young woman had been dead for several hours, and the broker called the coroner, who, after an examination, decided that death resulted from natural causes, and gave his verdict accordingly. The body was then removed to the undertakers in the city, where it was taken in charge by the next in kin. The private funeral, the expenses of which were paid by the broker, followed, and the incident was closed with only the merest mention in the newspapers, most of them contenting themselves with an eight or ten line notice, inasmuch as there were no sensational features apparent, and sudden deaths are not unusual. Of course, nobody outside of the family knew anything about the broker's proposed marriage to his operator.

"The broker continued to live in the house, but he gave up his business and all connection with worldly affairs, and after several years of a recluse's life, during all of which he provided liberally for his children in town, he died, and was buried with considerable ceremony. Then the heirs, with tearful eyes, began looking up the papers in order to determine what their share of his supposed great property would be and how it would be disposed of to each of them. This was very soon settled, because the papers showed that he had converted all his property into money, which he had kept in his safe and sent to his children in monthly remittances of such amounts as he felt inclined. There remained in the safe little less than $2,000, with a note to the effect that all the balance, in United States currency, had been destroyed, and a pile of ashes in the safe bore silent testimony as to the manner of its destruction. Even the house in which he and they had lived had been sold for cash, with the proviso that the purchasers were not to take possession until after his death. It was a clean-up of the most thorough kind.

"CALL" FROM A SPIRIT.

"After I had been in possession of the premises long enough to get things in ship shape I began setting up some poles to carry out an entirely new idea I had hit upon in telegraphy. Of course I knew about the little office, though I knew none of its history then, and I pressed it into service at once as part of my design. I fitted it up with the usual telegraphic paraphernalia, including an instrument, and this I connected with the instrument right here behind me. In this little room and the big one adjoining I passed nearly all my time.

"I suppose it was six or eight months after I had been living here before I got my wires running, and in that time I had discovered nothing out of the ordinary, nor had I ever been disturbed. On the first night, though, that I had the wires connecting my den here with the little office my troubles began. I was sitting that night when I began to hear my instrument here ticking faintly. I listened a moment and went into the room, when to my consternation the sounds began to struggle, so to speak, and then, as if with a great effort, there were four short ticks, followed by a long one and a short one. The first time these came with great difficulty, apparently, and then they followed rapidly, as if there were need of haste, and the ticking became what is known as a 'call.' That is, it was composed of the letters H and N. Taking my butler and a revolver, I went to the office, following the line of the wire, which was in perfect condition, as were all the instruments and everything in the office. It was tightly closed, too, and quite impossible of entrance, as I had double strengthened the doors and windows for the benefit of my experiments.

"Every night it was the same, and when I had visitors I cut the instrument out, so that by no chance should any person except myself learn of the skeleton I had in my den, for by this time it had become a skeleton no closet in the house could hold—and it wasn't mine, either. At the end of three months of this kind of thing I had by diligent and cautious inquiry learned enough of the history of the place to reach the conclusion that something mysterious and supernatural was affecting my instrument night after night and always at the same hour.

LAWYER EXPLAINS A MYSTERY.

"Then I resolved to put a stop to it all by heroic measures, and I called in a force of men, and, without explanation whatever to them, I ordered the office to be torn down. I supervised the work closely, and when I found a bundle of papers tucked away in a cubby-hole up near the roof I was not greatly surprised. In the papers I found nearly all I have told you duly set forth, with a note to an attorney in Boston concerning other papers in connection with the death of the young lady. I went at once to see that attorney, carrying the note and the papers, and explained to him what I knew of the case.

"He was kind enough to take the papers to keep for me and to say that he would give me further explanations on the death of the last of the broker's children, two of whom had been killed in a railroad wreck; one, the oldest son, had been shot in a saloon row in the West, and the last one was dying with consumption or dissipation at a New York hospital. In due time death claimed the consumptive, and I at once demanded the explanation the attorney had promised me.

"Without further ceremony he handed me a written statement made to him by the broker, whose life-long friend he had been, and which the broker had requested him to give to any one who might occupy the house and circumstances should arise whereby the occupant would ask explanations. This statement, after some preliminary history of the broker and his family affairs and troubles, went on to say that on the night before the morning of the discovery of the dead body of the operator, at about nine o'clock, she was notified by the night watchman of the place that there was a 'call' over the wire at the little office. This was not unusual when the broker came home late or did not come at all, and the girl, putting on a light wrap, went with the watchman to the office. At the door she told him she would call him at 10:30 to take her back to the house, as the broker would come back on that train and might have to return to the city on the midnight. As she did not call the watchman at the hour stated, he waited for her a few minutes and went to the office to see what was the matter.

MURDERED BY BROKER'S SON.

"Going in he passed on behind the screen where the telegraph table stood, and there he found the young lady with her head on the table and one hand resting on the key of the instrument. Evidently she had fallen asleep in the very act of sending a message, for there were times when she worked long and became very tired. She did not answer when he spoke to her, nor did she respond to a second call, and he went over and touched her. Something in the touch frightened him and he started at once to the house for help. On the way he met the broker who had come on the 10:30, and together they returned to the office. In a moment the broker discovered the girl was dead, and in another that she had no doubt been smothered to death at the table and left there to convey the impression that she had died naturally. Without telling the watchman of his suspicion, indeed, telling him that the girl must have died from heart failure, he consulted with him as to what was best to be done under the circumstances, and it was decided that the watchman, an old family servant and perfectly trustworthy, should carry the body of the operator to her room and leave her lying across the bed as if she had just come in and fallen there. This was done, and the maid 'discovered' the body in the morning.

"The broker was no keener in his detective sense than the others, but he had a suspicion that the others did not have, and he had picked up a peculiarly carved silver leadpencil on the table at which the dead girl had sat, which, if the watchman had seen there would have meant nothing more to him than the property of the operator. It was not, however, and the broker knew only too well that it could only have got on that table by falling from the vest pocket of his son during a struggle. What that struggle was, the result showed. As he saw it then, there was but one course for him to pursue. His affianced wife was dead, his son was her murderer, his other children no doubt accessories, his heart was broken, and his life wrecked, and, to take any action to remedy the wrongs done him would only make matters worse. For that reason he had pursued what he thought was the best course, and perhaps it was. In any event, his children never suspected that he knew until the end came, and then his disposal, or destruction, of his fortune may have given them some slight hint that he had just cause for making no further provision for them. Certainly they never told their suspicions, and it is only fair to them to say that they did not ask any too many questions of their father's last act.

WAS GIVING A DEATH CALL.

"That was the story, and from it I deduced the conclusion that the girl had made some effort at the time of the attack to call the office of the broker in town and give an alarm, or in some way convey the information of her deadly peril, and she had probably succeeded in sending a call in, but at the time the broker had left his office and was on his way home. How in later years, or why the spirit of the murdered operator should haunt the little office, and send out its cry for help, I am not able to explain. Perhaps there may be some electric current, reaching from the immaterial world to the material, or there may be some law of electric psychics which applies to this case. If there be, I do not care to learn it under the tutelage of any ghost. That is why I have retired from the telegraph business, and why there is not even a sign of the site of the little office with its murder and its ghostly visitant. I have even removed every wire from the entire premises for fear that somewhere in the atmosphere of the place the spirit of that smothered girl may still be fluttering and reaching out its struggling fingers to touch the key and tell the story of her taking off."

The reporter arose from his chair.

"By the way," he said instinctively, "didn't I understand you to say that those dots and dashes made by the ghost, or whatever it was, stood for the letters H and N?"

"That is what I said."

"May I ask what the H and the N stand for?"

"Oh," apologized the friend, "I quite forgot that those were the initials of her name, Hilda Nathalie. That is all I may tell you, except that she had adopted them as her 'call.'"—Chicago Inter Ocean.

THOMAS PAINE.

His Monument at New Rochelle, N. Y.

This grand monument erected by the admirers of Thomas Paine at New Rochelle stands on the farm where he lived, and land has grown so valuable that the site may be sold. This monument is having as troubled an existence as the famous author of "Common Sense" and "The Age of Reason" had while he was in this life, and as his memory has had (by some people and among that number I am sorry to state that some "men of the cloth" who are supposed to teach the teachings of the humble Nazarene from their pulpits) since he passed away. In short, the monument is being mutilated and defaced by persons who are apparently radically orthodox and call themselves Christians. In addition to this slow destruction of the monument itself, it is now probable that there will be some trouble in obtaining a final location for the memorial where it may be undisturbed by enemies and by the growth of New Rochelle.

After years of endeavor, the friends of Paine's memory succeeded in erecting a simple monument on the form where he lived and in time a fine bronze bust, made by the sculptor Macdonald, was placed on it, thus completing the memorial. This bust was unveiled on Decoration Day last year, when I wrote to The Progressive Thinker regarding it. The monument and bust now stand in a small enclosure at the lower end of the old Paine farm, fronting the highway, and also at the side of a small roadway.

This situation is one cause of the trouble that is now vexing the admirers of Paine. The town of New Rochelle wants to widen the highway into a street and to make the little roadway into another street. This would make of the plot of ground where the monument stands a desirable corner lot for building purposes, and the owners of the property are unwilling to have it taken up by the memorial to Paine.

Two distinct efforts are now on foot to protect the monument. One is to have the city of New Rochelle set aside the immediate ground about the monument, or some other suitable plot as a Paine park. The other is to have the friends of the famous free-thinker get up a subscription for the purpose of purchasing enough land on the old Paine farm for a park. As the opposition of the clergy (what a disgrace!) and others in New Rochelle is vigorous and determined toward any scheme for a city park for Paine, it is not probable that this project will meet with any success. Those most interested in the memorial are, therefore, resolved to raise money for purchasing land and establishing a park in which they may have the monument protected and preserved. As long as the See family, the owners of the Paine farm, lived, the monument was considered secure where it was placed by permission of Mr. J. W. See, who passed away recently. The Sees were friendly to Paine and to his memory, although they were Methodists in their belief. I think a few gentlemen of the cloth might learn a Christian lesson from this family—those that have tried and dismally failed to injure the memory of Thomas Paine from their pulpits. The passing away of Mr. J. W. See, however, leaves the estate in the hands of heirs, who will probably partition it among themselves. This makes it necessary to have the monument removed from its present place.

When one stops to think how the memory of Thomas Paine has been treated by the general public (and mostly church members) it makes a true American's heart bleed. The following hymn, "Contentment," Thomas Paine wrote on the old farm at New Rochelle, and in this hymn he shows more true Christian spirit than some of those that have tried but failed to defame his name.

O could we always live and love,
And always be sincere,
I would not wish for heaven above,
My heaven would be here.

Though many countries I have seen,
And more may chance to see,
My little corner of the world
Is half the world to me.

The other half, as you may guess,
America contains,
And thus, between them, I possess
The whole world for my pains.

I'm then contented with my lot,
I can no happier be,
For neither world I'm sure has got
So rich a man as me.

Then send no fiery chariot down
To take me off from hence,
But leave me on my heavenly ground—
This prayer is common sense.

Let others choose another plan,
I mean no fault to find,
The true theology of man
Is happiness of mind.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENG.

THE FLOWER MEDIUM—A TEST SEANCE.

A detailed account of a seance with Frau Anna—the so-called "Flower Medium" of Chemnitz—is given in the April number of "Psyche" by the editor. It took place on February 25th last, at the residence of Ober Inspector Herr Kaesser, at 24 Emserstrasse, Deutsch-Wilmersdorf, near Berlin, under the strictest test conditions, which seem to have precluded any possibility of deception. As such remarkable apports as those which occur with this medium are very unusual in the present day, a brief account of the proceedings will be of interest to readers of "Light."

There were twenty-five persons present at the seance, the sexes being about evenly divided. Among the gentlemen are the names of several writers in the psychic journals, who may be looked upon as competent investigators. Frau Anna, on her arrival, was conducted by a committee of four ladies into a room, where she took off all her clothing, which was locked up in a cupboard, and she was then attired in garments (described) provided by the ladies, none of whom had ever seen her before. Then holding her by both hands they led her into the seance room. The time was half-past five and the room was brightly lighted with gas.

Herr Max Jeutsh (teacher of languages), who is described as her conductor, was likewise examined by some of the gentlemen. During the seance he sat outside the circle surrounding the table, at a distance from the medium; took shorthand notes, occasionally gave some explanation, and was in full view of Herren Kaessar and Stenz, who sat near him. Frau Anna herself sat at a corner of the long table, with a lady on each side of her and a space between her and the wall behind.

The seance commenced at 5:30 p. m., and finished at a quarter before nine, the room being brilliantly lighted by gas. What may be called the preliminary portion consisted of addresses given through the medium while in a state of trance, by different controls; and the apports of flowers and other articles did not begin till twelve minutes past six, when the medium, in her normal condition, bowed herself over the table and called out, "Now, bring the flowers!" Immediately, from the back of the medium, high above, from the bare wall, a quantity of lovely flowers sprang forth and fell all about the table. All the flowers were fresh, not squeezed in any way, and covered with dew. A list of the apports is thus given: "Eight tulips with bulbs, twenty-four yellow Marguerities, nine cornflowers, nine forget-me-nots, sixteen sprays of mignonette, twenty-eight narcissus, eleven white and two rose hyacinths, three Maltese oranges, a white metal figure of Thorwaldsen's Christ, sixteen centimetres high, and weighing about a pound, and several medals, amulets, etc., in metal." These were brought at different intervals and taken away by the sitters. The following account is given of the apport of the figure of Christ: "The medium in trance moved forward over the edge of the table, raised her hand above the head of Herr Magnetiseur Milly Reichel, who was sitting quietly by her, and called out in anxious tones: 'Give it here, give it here,' when immediately a glittering object was seen in the air, and the medium held in her hand a figure of Christ (before described), which she passed, accompanied with some appropriate words, to Dr. Egbert Muller, who was visibly astonished."

The incidents are described with extreme minuteness, and a "protocol" was drawn up, which was signed by the whole of the assembled sitters with their full names, in declaration of their unanimous concurrence as to the genuineness and correctness of the description.

The editor at the conclusion adds a few remarks in which he speaks very highly of Frau Anna, concluding with these words: "Frau Anna's demeanor is simple, modest, dignified and devout."

THE PARIS CONGRESS.

The programmes for the forthcoming International Spiritualistic and Occult Congress in Paris are at last to hand, and promise to provide many items of interest for those who will have time and opportunity to attend. The date fixed is from September 15 to 26.

There is a generous comprehensiveness in the scope and aim of the organizers of the Congress, for a list of no less than thirteen societies is given, all working on various branches of spiritualistic and psychical investigation, and amalgamating to bring about a thoroughly representative union, their object being to "promote and develop the study of all spiritualistic sciences and doctrines."

The Congress will be divided into five sections: (1) Spiritist; (2) Magnetic; (3) Hermetic; (4) Theosophical; and (5) Spiritualistic (independent). The executive or organizing committee is formed of fifteen members, drawn three in number from each section. Their duties will be to attend to all business matters relating to the Congress, these obligations ceasing at the opening meeting.

For information concerning any of the various societies, membership, etc., address as follows:

For Spiritism—M. C. Duval, 55 rue du Chateau d'Eau.

Magnetism—M. H. Durville, 23 rue Saint-Merri.

Hermetic—M. Papus, 10 avenue des Peupliers.

Theosophy—M. P. Gillard, 38 rue de Verneuil.

Spiritism (various)—M. C. Duval, 55 rue du Chateau d'Eau.

Cards of invitation to the lectures will be given, as members of the Congress, to all who have paid a minimum subscription of 2fr. To those who pay a minimum fee of 6fr. a specially indicated card admitting to all the lectures will be given, while a subscription of 12fr. or more will entitle the member to obtain, when published, a complete record of the whole proceedings. Each volume will be numbered and signed, and will contain the name of the subscriber to whom it will be sent.

Perhaps a somewhat prominent feature of this Congress promises to be that part of it which will be devoted to the exposition of magnetism and its application to the science of healing. That particular section is represented by two societies, one styled the "School of Practical Magnetism and Massage," the other entitled "Syndicate of Masseurs and Magnetizers," so that the universal attention now being given to the many forms of mind and magnetic healing is likely to find its fullest and most scientific expression at this gathering.

The spiritistic programme, among other announcements, makes the following declaration: "One of the objects for special inquiry and consideration will be the evidence for reincarnation, and every effort will be made to collect documents referring to (1) Personal reminiscences of past existence; (2) The testimony of spirits who have affirmed that they have passed more than one life on earth; (3) Evidence that predictions to the effect that they will be reincarnated have been realized."

The committee will be pleased to receive the name and address of any society which may wish to send delegates.

There will also be a Congress on Hypnotism in August, from the 12th to the 15th, and those who desire to learn particulars concerning the proposed lectures should address the secretary of the society, Dr. Berillon, 14 rue Taitbout, Paris.

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

Now there was Dr. De Witt Talmage. It was no good discussing Talmage on Spiritualism—they may have read his lucubrations. Never in his life had he read such a muddle from so clever a man, for Dr. Talmage was a clever man. When in Australia he remembered the nonsense that Dr. Talmage had been betrayed into talking about evolution, and he was not in the least surprised that he should be capable of talking in a similar way about Spiritualism. Talmage was a man with a "gift of the gab," but he did not seem able to take on new ideas. Dr. Talmage's attitude was inexplicable. He admitted that there was some truth in Spiritualism, yet he said that ninety-nine cases out of one hundred were fraudulent. How did he know that? Then he said we had no business to know anything at all about it. If Dr. Talmage did not want to know, let him hold his peace. Why should he forbid others to gain knowledge? "Let knowledge grow from more to more." Any knowledge that was accessible was lawful, and might be useful.

Speaking of the attitude of the clergy towards Spiritualism, it might seem curious that Roman Catholics were so bitter about it. But they had very good reason for that. They took up the same position as Moses in his legislation against witchcraft. The whole history of the Roman Catholic Church was crammed full of Spiritualism; but Spiritualism was all right when it was in connection with the Pope, the cardinals, and the priests, appearance of saints, inspired trances, cures by the Virgin, etc. But anything outside the Roman Catholic Church was all wrong, or was of the devil. The tendency was to keep everything in the hands of the church; that was why Roman Catholicism was always jealous of anything abnormal outside its pale. It was just the same with Moses. All sorts of spiritualistic phenomena—lights, raps, trances, Urim and Thummim, visions, and every kind of occult thing—were all proper as long as they occurred under the control of the priests and Levites, and Moses and Aaron. Directly it cropped up outside their circle, as when Samuel was called up, then it was witchcraft! They wanted to keep it all to themselves. There was some wisdom about this policy, nevertheless. It did not spring only from greed of power and ambition. It meant that the leaders of the people were convinced, like Canon Wilberforce, of the great dangers of these things and of the great need for regulation, and their idea was by regulation to keep it all in their own hands. But the Protestant view of spiritualistic phenomena was the most imbecile of all, for while the average Protestant clergyman or religious person might admit that these things did occur, he held that they were invariably produced by evil spirits—the devil, in fact. But that was surely quite unphilosophical, because if bad spirits could return or communicate, why not good ones? It was illogical to contend that bad spirits were able to manifest but not the good. There was something to be said for the Roman Catholic view, but nothing at all for the stupid and illogical opposition of the average Protestant.

A QUEEN'S GHOST.

The ghosts which are said to frequent the precincts of Hampton Court palace are more or less known by reputation, but their ramblings have been promiscuous and uncertain. Great interest in their movements has, however, been newly aroused by the strange experience undergone by an artist who, during the past week, has been visiting certain rooms of the palace for the purpose of sketching the old Flemish tapestry on the walls. Whilst engaged in the Guard Watching Chamber in broad daylight—for the room is closed to the public at six o'clock—this gentleman, Mr. Haynes, of Surbiton, positively asserts that a spectre hand, white and delicate and richly jeweled, has persistently intruded between him and the tapestry. At first he imagined the disturbing element must be one of the many hands so beautifully inscribed on the tapestry, but the limb, he says, moved slowly from one stage to another, and pointed downwards.

Mr. Haynes was much agitated, and told several friends of this curious visitation. They, not unnaturally perhaps, advised him to dismiss the subject from mind and return to the chamber and his work. But the hand reappeared before his startled eyes, and on the last appearance of the phantom the artist made a hurried sketch of the outstretched hand, the rough outline of which depicts a brilliant marquise ring on the forefinger. The effect of these continued visits of the supernatural on Mr. Haynes is very visible; he is unnerved, and he has suspended his sketching.

These are the plain facts, but there is, it would seem, a weird and historic connection between this hand and the hand of the Queen Catherine Howard, one of the wives of King Henry VIII. A Lloyd's representative, visiting the scene of the alleged visitation the other day, ascertained that many of the officials, men who have spent a lifetime within the palace walls, fully believe that the two are identical, and they mostly regard the complaints made by Mr. Haynes as perfectly within the realm of probability.

DR. DEAN CLARKE IN LIVERPOOL DAULBY HALL.

Dr. Dean Clarke, the delegate from the National Asociation of Spiritualists of America to the Paris Congress, favored us with his presence at our two services on Sunday. Dr. Clarke, who was accompanied by Mrs. Pratt, of the Boston Lyceum, received a hearty welcome from the Liverpool Lyceum, No. 1, to whom they made their first address on English soil. They again occupied our platform in the evening, when Dr. Clarke delivered a very fine address, which was heartily applauded by the audience. We bespeak a cordial reception for our American co-workers during their stay in England, and trust they will have nothing but pleasant memories to carry back to their native shores.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL

BY

LOREN ALBERT SHERMAN.

Sets forth the Philosophy of Existence, with detailed evidence. It appeals to Christians and Spiritualists alike, as it demonstrates the truth of the spirit manifestations of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian religion is based, as well as the actuality of modern spirit manifestations. Its title page claims that the book is

A SCIENTIFIC DEMONSTRATION of the Existence of the soul of man as his conscious individuality independently of the physical organism; of the CONTINUITY OF LIFE and the ACTUALITY OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The first eleven chapters are devoted entirely to manifestations of the soul incarnate, with a clear exposition of the psychic philosophy.

The succeeding four chapters set forth the philosophy of the Infinite.

The last twenty chapters are devoted to an exposition of spiritual philosophy, with evidence in detail, much of it being personal experiences of the author.

The price of the book is $1. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker.

After Orthodoxy, What?

Within the whole range of the Christian ministry we do not know of one who has a better grasp on the follies of Christianity, or one who is more outspoken, than is Rev. Minot J. Savage, of the Church of the Messiah, New York. Independent in thought, brave in utterance, and as learned as he is honest, every word falling from his lips, or indicted by his pen, is worthy of preservation. We find in the North American Review for April an article from his pen in which he inquires, "After Orthodoxy, What?" Our always crowded columns will not permit the publication of the article at length, but a couple of paragraphs will be greatly enjoyed by The Progressive Thinker's readers, who sympathize with the expressed views of the editor. Read and think:

"The essential features of the orthodox theory of religion have been discredited by the knowledge of the modern world. Since a similar thing has happened over and over again in the past, it ought not to seem strange that it should happen again in a growing universe. The foundation stone of orthodoxy has always been the dogma of the Fall of Man and the consequent lost and ruined condition of the race. In accordance with this theory, the one great work of religion has been to 'save' men from this 'ruin.' That has been the theory of the Fall—and in the light of it all the wrong and sorrow, the vice and crime of the world have been explained. But study of Jewish thought and life has shown that this whole Eden story was a late importation from a Pagan people. The older prophets knew nothing of it. And even Jesus, who is said to have been supernaturally sent to save us from the effects of the Fall, never made the slightest allusion to it. Besides this, science has demonstrated that man has steadily risen from the first, and it makes all stories of original perfection impossible of belief, on the part of all free and intelligent people. And thus we are now able to explain the world's evil, vice, crime, suffering, and death in the light of theories much more honorable to God and more helpful to man. Since orthodoxy is inextricably bound up with these theories, since she has committed herself to the assertion that they have been infallibly revealed, she must cease to be orthodox—i. e., 'right opinion'—now that these beliefs are passing away.

"The only thing that is happening, then, is that the world is growing wiser and better. This should seem to be cause for rejoicing rather than lamentation; unless people really hold the opinion of the old Scotch lady who said: 'Some persons think everybody is going to be saved; but, for my part, I hope for better things.'"

Hypercritical.

Was not the Methodist Conference, late in session in this city, over critical in its condemnation of President McKinley, for not abolishing the canteen from the army? That distinguished personage may deserve severe censure for some of his administrative acts, but we are clearly of the opinion he does not for not abolishing the canteen.

The canteen proper is a vessel, formerly of wood, holding about two quarts, which was suspended by a strap over the shoulder, designed to carry water when an army was on a march, or engaging in battle. A touching story is told of its use in English history: Sir Philip Sidney, engaged in battle at Zutphen, Netherlands, September 22, 1586, fell severely wounded, a musket ball passing through his thigh, shattering the bone. Faint from loss of blood he asked for water. As a canteen was being placed to his lips he saw a wounded soldier who looked at the canteen with wishful eyes. Sidney passed the coveted treasure to the sufferer with the remark: "Drink, thy necessities are greater than mine." Sidney, one of the early English poets, died a few days later, said by Queen Elizabeth to be the brightest jewel in her dominions.

The use of the canteen may be perverted, and may be filled by the soldier with an intoxicant. Who ever thought of abolishing a pocket because filthy tobacco, or a noisome pipe is carried in it?

Let the Conference war as bitterly as it may against the improper use of the canteen and no exception will be taken to its action. Intoxicants were long since banished from the army as a ration. This was brought about by the exertion of temperance reformers perhaps fifty years ago, when the doors of Methodist churches were closed against temperance lecturers. The recent Conference came quite too late to the rescue to be of any practical utility; besides it strikes at the innocent vessel instead of denouncing its improper use, which is the act of the soldier not the President, who is in no manner responsible for its perversion.

Superstition of Filipinos.

In Cavite Viejo and vicinity a lot of natives, says the Manila American, who are insurgents at heart, but have "no stomach for fighting," have been muttering against the Americans. The ostensible cause of their complaint is that Lieut. Paul A. Barry, of the Fourth Infantry, has been living in a house which is alleged to belong to Aguinaldo.

The house in question is one of the largest buildings in Cavite Viejo, and when it became necessary to use the residence for military purposes, Señora Famy (Aguinaldo's mother), who occupied the dwelling, was politely asked to move out. She complied with the request made of her by the military authorities and went to live in Bincayan. The men of Company I, of the Fourth Infantry, were quartered in one wing of the building, and Lieut. Barry occupied the big front room.

This room was formerly Aguinaldo's favorite place of abode. The walls are beautifully frescoed and the ceiling has painted on it a picture representing the ocean. In the background of the picture there are three mountains. In the space between the center and left one the sun appears in magnificent splendor. In the foreground of the picture is a set of steps leading from the ocean upward. On the topmost step sits a native girl in national costume, holding a Filipino flag, the upper end of the flagstaff being capped by a bow and arrow. To the left of her and at her feet is the Spanish flag, lying in the dust, with the staff broken, and near this are pieces of the chains symbolizing the harshness of Spanish tyranny and the breaking of it.

This room seems to have been a sort of audience room. Against the far wall is an altar, to the right and left of which are figures of the Virgin Mary and Jesus, in half life size. On top of the altar is a group of figures, eighteen inches in height, representing Mary, Joseph and the child Jesus. Under a curtain of gaudy material one may see a life-size figure of Jesus, representing him dead and ready for the tomb.

The holy of holies in this room, according to Filipino ideals, is the recumbent image of Jesus. With this statue of the Savior, Aguinaldo claimed to have held many long conversations, and his ignorant and deluded followers believed that the image of Jesus often gave the self-constituted dictator advice as to the management of the insurrection. When Aguinaldo left Cavite Viejo, by his orders a light was kept constantly burning on a pedestal in front of the image, and when Señora Famy moved away she pleaded as an excuse for wanting to stay that it was the command of the saints that she should always keep a lighted candle in that particular place.

Lieut. Barry had lived in the Aguinaldo mansion but a short time when the insurrectos attempted to foment discord by saying a "great sacrilege" was being committed.

The images and the sacred picture were not molested, but the refractory natives were angered because an American officer used Aguinaldo's audience chamber for a sleeping apartment. As time went on this talk increased and in Bincayan especially threats were made that Lieut. Barry would be killed if he did not vacate the premises.

But the Lieutenant is a brave man, and was not in the least intimidated by the reports of what the insurrectos had said. Mistaking leniency for fear, the insurgent sympathizers in Bincayan went so far as to say that Lieut. Barry was afraid to come to their barrio because he would surely be put to death if he did. When these assertions came to the ears of the officer whose life had been threatened he at once proceeded to show the natives how little he cared for their blustering. Going immediately to Bincayan, he collected a number of the braggarts and admonished them to do less talking or they would get into trouble.

The malcontents were thoroughly cowed by Lieut. Barry's unexpected action and since then the propriety of his living in Aguinaldo's "casa" has not been questioned in Bincayan.

Memorial to Thomas Paine.

The following is an Associated Press dispatch from New York, of date May 16. Every person of intelligence who is willing to give credit where credit is due, will rejoice at this action. The man whose pen inspired the flame which made this country free; which divorced church and state; whose religion was to do good, and whose great thoughts are reflected in all the state papers of the Revolution; and whose personal hatred of monarchy was inspired because of his love of liberty, and exposure of the shams and the fables of the church, deserves immortal fame, though his bones may rest in an obscure or even unknown grave. We quote:

"The only memorial in this country of Thomas Paine, the Revolutionary hero, a monument at New Rochelle, N. Y., is to be perpetuated by money contributed by delegates to the late middle-of-the-road Populist convention at Cincinnati. When Paine died in New York he hoped his body might be buried in a Quaker cemetery, but the Quakers refused permission.

"Cobbett, the English radical, some time afterward, took Paine's bones to England in hope of arousing enthusiasm for Paine's doctrines. His object failed, and the remains were lost track of, so that Paine's grave is unknown. The house in which Paine died has been torn down to make way for a street; the street called Reason street, after Paine's book, 'The Age of Reason,' has been renamed, and Paine's farm in New Rochelle, given to him by Congress, has been cut up into city lots. A few years ago a number of Free Thinkers erected a shaft and bust of Paine on a lot that was part of the farm. Now a boulevard will be cut through the lot, necessitating the removal of the monument.

"Capt. George W. Lloyd, of New Rochelle, a delegate to the Cincinnati convention, suggested to other delegates that it would be an excellent scheme to buy an acre of land on the farm voted to Paine by Congress. The place could also be used for Populist conventions. He outlined the plan to former Governor Davis H. Waite, of Colorado, who subscribed $300. Wharton Barker, presidential nominee; Ignatius Donnelly, and Weller of Iowa, pledged $300 each, and the land will be bought and the monument preserved."

A Recount Not Desired.

The census being taken as we go to press, makes no note of religious matters. The clergy were disgusted with the reports of ten years ago; for it proved by accurate count that this is "in no sense a Christian nation." While but 30 per cent of the people were Christians then, it is questionable if they would equal 25 per cent now, hence the milk in the cocoanut.

Protestants Vindicated.

"The Sacred Heart Review," a Roman Catholic organ, in its issue of April 28, made a statement which, with propriety, may arrest attention. The subject of the late Mission Conference in New York being under consideration, the editor said:

"In all the speeches made at this Protestant Mission Conference there was not a single allusion to the missionary labors of the church [Catholic]. The church has been carrying on this work for nearly two thousand years, and every nation that is Christian to day received its Christianity from that church. Protestants entered on the work about one hundred years ago; in the meantime it has expended many millions of money, employed many thousands of men and women, but it has failed to convert even one nation to Christianity. Even the church is hindered and crossed at every step, and she fails as a consequence to gather the full fruits of her missionary labors."

They who are familiar with the subject know the "Review" is correct in its statement. Not a single nation as such has been converted to Christianity through the action of the Protestants. A few individual converts have been made in heathen countries; but compared with the entire population, the numbers are extremely limited.

Not so with the Catholics. They had the Romans with them from the very beginning. That government was really subordinate to the Romish Church, founded, it is claimed, by Numa, near seven hundred years before our era. The Roman executive, by virtue of his office, was Supreme Pontiff, clothed from the days of Numa, with precisely the authority afterwards exercised by the Popes. "He spent his whole time," says a learned historian, "in inspiring his subjects with a love of piety, and veneration for the gods. He built many new temples, instituted sacred offices and feasts, and the sanctity of his life gave him credit enough to persuade his people that he had a particular correspondence with the goddess Egeria. By her advice he built the temple of Janus, which was to be shut in peace, and open in war. He ordained Vestal Virgins, who [presided in the temple] being four in number, had great privileges allowed them."

Says Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, article Numa:

"The Pontiffs took care, by precept and by chastisement, that the laws relating to religion should be observed both by individuals and by the state. * * He prescribed the rites according to which the people might offer worship and prayer acceptable to the gods. * * At Numa's entreaty he exempted the people from the terrible duty of offering human sacrifices."

These duties of the Pontiffs survived under the Popes, and are still observed. With the latter the "chastisements" took on the form of torture and the stake, and were powerful weapons for making Christians and compelling loyalty to the faith.

The unfortunate Protestants lacked this machinery for crushing nations, terrorizing individuals, and confiscating estates, hence their inability to accomplish what the Mother church has done in Christianizing nations. Had Catholics been less successful in this direction humanity would have been the gainers, and Protestants themselves would never have reached their present prominence.

To Make Small Boys Merciful.

With a view of doing what they can to make anti-cruelty societies unnecessary in the future, says the Chicago Tribune, some Chicago women have started the work of teaching the beauty of the quality of mercy to the city's children. The organizers proceed on the accepted theory that there is in every child a natural interest in animals. As the president of the anti-cruelty society puts it, "This interest, misdirected, shows itself in a desire to trap, torment, or kill, but, directed aright, it quickly becomes love of nature, coupled with a desire to protect the weaker animals." Although the work is new, some idea of its extent may be had from the fact that at the last meeting of the last "mercy class" formed there were present 266 boys. Street boys, alley boys, schoolboys, and "pet" boys were present. The noise that they made between talks was nothing short of terrific. There was quiet, however, and an intensity of interest when they were told how a small boy had fought a big boy to save an alley cat from torture. There was patient listening to the tale of a bluejay's plucky defence of its nest.

The boys seem to get awakened quickly to the fact that the living bird or squirrel is of much more interest than the same creature after the slingshot has done its work. Some people might think that certain inevitable consequences of this mercy work were disagreeable. If they are the teachers and the promoters of the anti-cruelty lessons suffer "and make no sign." One of these inevitable consequences is that, having declared themselves the friends of the weak and suffering creatures, the directors of the work find themselves the recipients of many a stray, starving cat or dog which the scholars have picked up among the city's ash heaps. Boys are shrewd, and there is not the slightest doubt that the first homeless animal was turned over to the teachers with a view of testing their sincerity. They have stood the test. A single look of aversion or disgust when the starving and not overclean dog was presented for protection would have forever lost the cause of the anti-cruelty promoters. At the last meeting of the big North Side Band of Mercy there was spirited bidding for the privilege of taking home a wandering puppy.

It is the intention ultimately to form classes in all sections of the city. It is superfluous to speak of the excellence of the work. It is one of the best that can be undertaken. The reward for those who are engaged in it lies wholly in the twice blessedness of the quality of mercy.

Criminal Statistics.

The biennial report of the Joliet State prison of Illinois, makes the following frightful report of the religious standing of the convicts now suffering imprisonment:

Roman Catholics, 508; Methodists, 278; Baptists, 164; Lutherans, 146; Presbyterians, 73; Episcopals, 55; Christians, 18; Congregationalists, 16; Jews, 15; Universalists, 6; Buddhist, 1; no religious belief, 68. Total, 1,298.

Verily, with 95 1-5 per cent of all those serving the State for crime Christians, it is easy to understand why the religious press denominates the United States a "Christian nation." There is one consolation: While locked up these Christians are least liable to do injury to the general public, still at times even there they kill each other.

Dr. Slade, the Once Famous Medium.

Henry Slade, the famous Spiritualistic medium, whose remarkable career would fill a volume, and who suddenly dropped completely out of public notice about three years ago, has been discovered in Toledo, says a dispatch in the Inter Ocean. Mr. Slade has been in this city about ten days and is stopping at the residence of J. N. Walker, No 331 Eleventh street. He is undergoing a course of magnetic treatments for his right side, which is partially paralyzed.

Slade has been at Ann Arbor part of the time since his disappearance under an assumed name. The balance of the time he absolutely refuses information about.

About four years ago Mr. Slade was sand-bagged in New York city and robbed of over $10,000 in diamonds and money. [A gross exaggeration. He probably never had $500 in cash at any one time in his life.] One entire side of his body became affected from the injuries received. Strange to relate, with the paralysis of his body the so-called mediumistic powers that had brought him wealth and fame almost entirely deserted him. Broken in health and shattered in fortune and bereft of his means of livelihood, he lapsed into oblivion and was regarded by a majority of Spiritualists throughout the country as dead.

Mr. Slade to-day told a tale which, if true, is little short of miraculous. He states that during the few days he has been here he has improved wonderfully, and that with his returned health his power as medium is being restored to him. Sunday night, for the first time since the sand-bagging affair, he was able to walk for a considerable distance, and this afternoon, in the presence of witnesses, he gave what he says is his first really successful demonstration of slate-writing in several years. Slade states that if he continues to mend as rapidly as he is now doing it will only be a few weeks before he is restored to his full power a a medium. Slade is well known in Toledo, where he has appeared several times. His last appearance here was about ten years ago, and during the few days he was in the city his achievements were the talk of the town. He gave private seances at a number of private residences, and for months after he departed Toledo's "400" occupied themselves by giving "spirit-rapping" parties, etc. Shortly after leaving Toledo he went to Europe, where he achieved an even greater reputation than in this country.

He was entertained and feted by royalty, gave private demonstrations before the Prince of Wales, was a guest at the court of the Czar of Russia for several months, and gave an impetus to the Spiritualistic movement in the old country that brought thousands of persons into the Spiritualistic fold. In Germany he was subjected to the most rigid tests by the most famous scientists of the century, among whom was Professor Zolner, and succeeded in completely baffling their combined efforts to discredit him.

It was in Germany that he performed his first successful experiment in the disintegration and reunification of matter, causing two solid rings of different wood to become united, one within the other. This feat, while not sounding so remarkable, was the most convincing proof ever given of the genuineness of his claims. The difference in material, so far as the two rings were concerned, proved that they could not have possibly been whittled out of one piece, and the microscopic and chemical tests to which they were subjected proved that they had not been united by any means known to science. In London Slade was arrested and placed on trial, charged with fraud and trickery. He secured his freedom by allowing himself to be searched, handcuffed, gagged, and blindfolded, and while in that condition, giving a seance in open court.

Slade's demonstration to-day was in the form of slate-writing, and in a few minor tests with which his name has been associated. He sat in front of a large dining-room table and requested a reporter to seat himself opposite. Two ordinary school slates were produced, and submitted for inspection. Both were of the commonest pattern, simply but strongly constructed. Mr. Slade stated at the time that if the visitors so desired they might step out and procure two slates of their own. An ordinary slate pencil was next passed for examination, after which Slade bit off a small piece, about the size of a pencil point. One of the slates was placed upon the table, in full sight, and the bit of pencil placed upon it. The other slate was laid on top of it.

Slade grasped the two slates at one end with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand and placed them edgewise on top of the table, requesting the reporter to grasp the other end in similar manner. Almost immediately a distinct tapping was heard, apparently coming from between the two slates. Slade's right hand was resting on the arm of the chair at his side, and the hand that held the slate was in such a position as to preclude all possibility of his moving it in the slightest degree, without attracting attention. "These slate-writings are generally produced," explained Mr. Slade, "by a spirit who calls himself Dr. Davis. He has been with me now for forty years."

The rappings from the interior of the slate increased in vehemence until the table shook with their force, and it required no small exertion of strength on the part of the reporter to keep his end upright.

"If Mr. Davis is present," said the medium, "he will please rap three times." Three distinct raps were heard.

"Have you a message for the gentleman present?" was Mr. Slade's next query.

Almost immediately a rapid, scratching noise was heard, which sounded exactly like a person scribbling away for dear life. In perhaps three minutes the writing ceased—there was one hard rap, and all was quiet. The slates were separated with considerable difficulty, as there was a vacuum between them, and the side of one was found completely covered with a closely written communication, as follows:

"My friend: Many people doubt the power of Spiritualistic control, when at times it has been the gift of ages, races, and countries, as ancient history will prove. Many have this gift of mediumship if they would develop it. Look into your Bible. There you will find where spirits came and talked to men in those days. If that be true, they do and can to-day, as my coming is proof of the fact. I am the spirit of Dr. Davis."

"Let me try another test," said Slade. This time the bit of pencil, which was completely worn down from its recent experience, was placed in the middle of the table and a single slate placed over it. The scribbling was resumed and almost immediately stopped. Picking up the slate Mr. Slade revealed scrawled across it the words "He does." Mr. Walker, who had entered the room, noticed a little pencil point lying upon the table.

"Do the powers think Mr. Slade will be better to-morrow?" he asked. "If so, move the point."

The little pencil point almost immediately jumped about six inches in the air, alighting several inches from the place in which it had originally been placed. Nobody was within three feet of it at the time. "I think Dr. Slade has exercised himself enough to-day," remarked Mr. Walker. "He is still very weak." This ended the test.

Plain, Significant Words.

The following plain, but significant words come from Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the New York Daily Journal:

There are, in New York City and elsewhere in the land, clergymen and men who call themselves disciples of Christ, who are living lives of deception and falsehood.

If one of them reads these words he will recognize himself. It is useless for him to attempt to deceive his own soul; he cannot do it. He knows he is a liar and a knave at heart, but he has hardened himself to the thought by saying that he is no more than other men. I saw once upon a time a town placarded with the announcement that a certain man of God was to deliver a free lecture to young men on "Morality."

Only a few days previous a distracted woman had confided to me her desperation and misery because in a moment of weakness this very clergyman had caused her to lower herself in her own moral sight.

She had told him of her husband's neglect and unfaithfulness and asked his advice and assistance as a clergyman and spiritual adviser. He had given the sympathy most agreeable to a man. The woman was a weak, hysterical fool. The man was a hypocrite and devil. Had he not pretended to be a man of God—a teacher and guide for humanity I would say he acted the role of a mere man and that the weakness was mainly on the part of the wife who appealed to him.

A man's recipe for curing the wounds made by sin is another sin.

A young lady of my acquaintance accepted a position in the employ of a clergyman and was obliged to leave after a few weeks because of the shocking discoveries she made regarding his methods of life. Other young women were in his employ as secretaries and assistants in his large charitable organizations, and so much that was secretive, suggestive and unwholesome prevailed in the environment that my friend beat a hasty retreat.

The clergyman still preaches the Word of God to hungry souls.

Better never hear the Bible or religion mentioned than to sit in the presence of such a hypocrite and blasphemer. It is bad enough when a physician of the body enters a household to spread moral disease and wretchedness within its walls. There are such doctors in the land—men who take advantage of a sick woman's weakness to mislead and pervert her mind and soul.

But when a Doctor of Divinity acts such a role it makes one willing to believe in an old-fashioned hell, with an old-fashioned devil, cloven-footed and horned, preparing his pot of brimstone for the sinner.

A Promoter of Discord.

It is stated as a fact, by a Washington correspondent of an exchange, that when Rev. Sheldon was "running the Topeka Capital as Jesus would," Rev. Wilbur F. Craft acted as chief contributor. Craft is reported to be a "Petition Promoter," his chief occupation consisting in drafting, circulating, and presenting to Congress, petitions praying that body to legislate in the interest of the church. One session is spent in trying to get God in the Constitution, enthroning his son as King, and making the Bible the base of legislation. During that period the country is flooded with blank petitions sent out by him for signatures, praying for such an amendment to the organic law of the nation, the Rev. Promoter preying on the signers of the petitions for finances to pay the expense. Of course compensation for his own invaluable services comes out of such contributions.

Next session of Congress Sunday is the burden of the priest's lament. Souls are going hellward at a terrible rate, because of the desecration of God's sacred day. The employes of the government compelled to do duty in the interest of the public are all doomed to destruction. Railway trains must lie off and allow its servants to have a gay time on Sunday, the shipping must lie idle at the warfs, everybody but the priests, and the women who get Sunday dinners, must rest by going to church, and contribute from their weekly earnings to pay for the preacher's support.

Next session polygamy is made the burden of Craft's labors. Prostitution and concubinage attract no attention, but the great evil the world has really outgrown, and which State Legislatures have everywhere made a penal offence, but which Jesus never condemned, becomes with the Promoter a subject for national legislation.

Still failing, Craft wants Congress to lock horns with marriage and divorce. Drunkenness, cruelty, desertion, neglect to support, attempts to murder, conviction of a felony or infamous misdemeanor, are not causes for separation. Nothing but adultery with him is sufficient grounds for divorce; so when uncongenially mated this lesser misdemeanor is resorted to by connivance, and the preacher really encourages it, and wants Congress to make this the only way out of a bad and demoralizing bargain.

When the whole circle of projects fail our Promoter will go over the gamut again. If he dies some one else will see in this an easy method to gain subsistence, and so the work will go on from one generation to another.

For more than two thousand years, commencing long before the beginning of our era, the conflagration of the universe in the interest of the then prevailing religions, were harped upon in a similar way, and it is still kept up, and probably will be for the same purpose as is the agitation of the Petition Promoter, to gain support for himself and family without becoming a toiler. We own to great admiration for Craft's genius and energy, but somehow cannot commend his methods.

A Correction.

A regrettable mistake occurred in the third paragraph of the second column of Charles Dawbarn's recent article on "The Size of Man," by which one line is duplicated and the line "when it happens to become personified. The" is omitted.

Talmage At It Again.

When Samantha Allen was awakened in the middle of the night by the most dreadful sounds, and she awoke her "Pardner" Josiah in affright, he listened a moment and then exclaimed: "Them blamed cats are at it again!" So with the "great preacher," after blowing his Gabriel's blast against Spiritualism, he makes a sermon on his ideas of heaven, and it so far exceeds the most materialistic Spiritualist's belief, that it would be a camel even for the all-swallowing "test-hunters." In other words, he is at it again!

The rubbish of his sermon is scarcely worth consideration, but some of his ideas are exceedingly ludicrous in the oracular way he puts most commonplace thoughts in his intense egotism.

He thinks the angels are all robust, and says: "I remark, that we can get no idea of the health of heaven!" He of course means the health of the angels, the twenty-four elders, of Jesus, and Jehovah, but he falls into the slip-shod expression of the penny-a-liner.

He appears to be under the delusion that somebody has set up the belief that there is a great deal of sickness in heaven and he is the champion of the other side. He knows all about it from a word of two of Paul's, and as one who has just come from heaven is able to tell all about it. He assures his hearers with a shout, and a somersault that at the latest the health of heaven was excellent, and what is more, every one who is so fortunate as to have his sins washed white by the blood of the lamb, when they die will enter into a state of happy robustitude.

But his ideas of what the first thing a spirit will do when it passes the portals of death, are yet more laugh-provoking.

It will want some one to show it around the "blessed place," and God has attended to the matter, and appointed "ushers," who stand ready year in and year out, to take the newly-arrived around and show them the sight. In the lurid rhetoric of the great acrobat, "the usher angel says to the newly-arrived: 'These are the martyrs that perished at Piedmont; these were torn to pieces at the Inquisition; this is the throne of the great Jehovah; this is Jesus.'"

As God apparently has all the various clans and cliques set apart, the usher might continue to show indefinitely by pointing out, "Here are the Baptists, here the Methodists, down in that pit are the Mormons for following the example of the patriarchs; up in that alcove are Adam and Eve, there is Jonah, under his gourd-vine; in that castle is Jack, famous on earth as the killer of wicked giants; in that pretty little cottage is Mother Goose who wrote such nice, religious poems for the children; here we keep the three children who went through the fiery furnace, so many inquire for them, you see how the golden pavement is here worn by the feet of the endless train of sight-seers; here is Abraham, and allow me to introduce him to you, with his son Isaac; you see the Jews are kept in this department, a healthy lot, in fact all are in full enjoyment of robust health!"

Gillman Talks of His Rascality.

Two years' time have wrought great changes with E. Medford Gilman. Two years ago he was a Spiritualist—the sensation of the day, says the News, of Grand Rapids, Mich. He was a careful dresser with the bearing of a gentleman used to society. His soft, white hands were covered with fine rings. To-day he is an iron molder. His hands are black and calloused. He wears the garb of a laborer and smells of the workshop.

"I am through with Spiritualism," he said.

Even had not his appearance been convincing, the manner in which he spoke the one sentence would leave no room for doubt.

E. Medford Gillman's brief period of notoriety was coincident with that of Ascher, who is serving a life sentence for the murder of Valmore C. Nichols, and Donovan, the "trumpet medium," who fled the city to escape police investigation.

Gillman held seances at which moving, speaking, singing, caressing ghosts were produced. He soon gathered about him a fairly large circle for his "materialization seances" on Lafayette avenue. The police rudely destroyed the illusion, and killed Gillman's lucrative enterprise. An examination of the house revealed that the deception had been carried on by means of trap doors and subterranean ways, dug beneath the house.

Gillman's arrest also disclosed the fact that Maude Jones, the pretty wife of a Wisconsin printer, had left her husband to join the fake medium in this city. She was the piano player at the seances.

Gillman was tried, convicted and sentenced to two years at the house of correction by Judge Chapin.

Gillman took his sentence philosophically, served his time and left the prison to begin life anew a few weeks ago. He has abandoned Spiritualism for good. Not that he is remorseful or has "reformed." "It was a bad speculation" is the way he puts it.

Gillman says he was once a sincere believer in Spiritualism, "but," he says, "my credulity did not last very long. I could see, couldn't I? I was 'on' soon. Observing that there was money in the business I discovered that I was a medium. I was regularly ordained. I can do slate-writing, paint pictures on handkerchiefs with a nice little message in indelible ink, while the sitter is holding the handkerchief, work the 'clicker' or telegraph instrument; in brief, do any and all manifestations that go with the business."

This man Gillman was an educated trickster, like scores of others who are infesting our ranks, and who are daily deceiving the gullible public. There were many Spiritualists who would swear that his manifestations were genuine examples of Spirit Power, and to expose him at one time would have brought down upon one's head the maledictions of his admirers.

Churches Worse than Saloons.

A news paragraph from Toledo, O., of the 18th ult., reports as follows:

"I am satisfied the churches of to-day are doing more harm in the world than the saloons," said Rev. Dr. Charles Patton to an ultra-fashionable audience in a local theatre this week. A profound sensation and some show of a demonstration followed, but Dr. Patton continued his address. He outlined a liberal church that could and would command and retain the respect of thinking men; a church that kept within the proper limits of its office and one that would countenance and encourage legitimate amusements. He proposed pool and billiard tables, bowling alleys, shuffle-boards, chess and checkers, and pretty much every other form of entertainment preferred by men. He declared rum to be the one great evil of the world, and barred it from the life of man.

And Still They Advance.

By the published sermon of a Baptist preacher in a neighboring city, it appears that denomination, like most other sects, has changed front in regard to the final destiny of the heathen. The divine said his denomination formerly taught all who did not accept Jesus were finally lost, hence the necessity of carrying a knowledge of him to all people. "Now," he said, "the idea prevails that all who believe in God and work righteousness will be saved."

That is a big leap for a Baptist. Save the savage tribes there are no people who do not believe in God. They have different conceptions of his attributes, but there are few who have not some form of a God who governs the universe. They who were reputed to have millions of gods prove on better acquaintance to have only one supreme God.

If worthy lives are what the pulpiteer meant by "righteousness," and if statistics of crime can be trusted, or if reports of Christian missionaries are taken, the most moral people in the world are the Buddhists, who are classed by the church as heathen. The Mohammedans fall little short; while Parsees and Jews are very generally models of all the virtues. The Brahmins, too, if British reports are accepted, seem a very worthy people, almost wholly free from the great vices of the so-called Christian nations.

This teaching of the Baptist is, indeed, a happy change from the teachings of two generations ago, when all the world was to be damned, save the few who believed in a virgin-born and a crucified God.

No Fear When Death Draws Nigh.

We meet so often in the religious press with accounts of the wretched death of unbelievers, and the mournful lament that their souls are lost, we should involuntarily accept them as true had not long observation taught no confidence can be placed in anything coming from a priest on that subject. The "Story of Altamont," by Dr. Young, near two centuries ago, a fiction to begin with, has served as the model for a multitude of feebler fictions to frighten the unwary and credulous.

The Philadelphia Record awhile ago, gave an account of an interesting interview with an old medical practitioner of that city, which we take pleasure in quoting, as follows:

"I have seen thousands of persons die under all sorts of circumstances, and never yet have I seen one display the slightest fear of death." This remarkable statement was made the other day by a physician who has practiced many years in Philadelphia and who has seen a great deal of hospital service.

"It is a popular fallacy," he went on, "to imagine that a deathbed scene is ever terrible other than as a parting between loved ones. The fear of the unknown is never present at the last. Even amid ignorance and vice I have never experienced such scenes as a novelist who strives after realism will sometimes picture.

"When a patient is told that he cannot recover and the end is near, he invariably seems resigned to his fate, and his only thought seems to be of those who are to be left behind. This is true alike of men and women.

"Those who become hysterical and declare they are not fit to die are the ones who are not as ill as they think they are. They always get well.

"A psychological reason? Oh, I don't know that there is any. It's just a human trait."

An aged medical practitioner at our elbow while we write, says the above statement is fully confirmed by him, though his own observation is more limited.

What Next?

From time immemorial it has been said by the most orthodox that Paul wrote the epistle to the Romans. That is why he made it so sneering at women—a crusty old bachelor, jilted in his youth, perhaps, the reason.

Now the learned and orthodox Prof. Harnack, of Germany, comes out and claims it was written by a woman! He thinks Priscilla, one of Paul's "dear friends," was the writer! Shades of the theologians who have fought for Paul, and kept woman from speaking in church, and all the time trusting in a weak woman! Believing a woman was inspired! Who ever heard of a theologian believing a woman could be inspired? Eve brought him into the world, and woman has been accursed and of no good except to raise children to stamp the serpent's head!

But have not the heaven-inspired theologians known without doubt who wrote Romans? Why this unrest, this uncertainty about an infallible book?

Will Prof. Harnack be tried for heresy? If not, why not? His is the most appalling and ludicrous—heresy since the infallible Council of Bishops put the seal of God on the Priscilla epistles.

A Miniature Rebellion.

The Methodist Conference while in session in this city on May 16, had a little bout of its own, which shows all is not concord in the higher circles of that great church. In the midst of turmoil growing out of the clergy giving their free passes to the Auditorium to friends, then beating their own way by insulting doorkeepers, and ushers, and overriding policemen, all for their great love of God, W. H. Wamock, a lay delegate from Cincinnati, rose in his place and unmercifully scored the white-choker fraternity by declaring:

"Some ministers are used to having everything their own way, and do not consider themselves amenable to the civil law. They think they are a little better than anybody else."

The words must have come from the heart. They certainly expressed a great and well-known truth.

Riches Versus Righteousness.

The income of John D. Rockefeller is reckoned at $70,000,000. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God."

The son of this rich man has a Sunday school class of sixty children. Will he obey the command of Jesus to sell all he has, or inherits, and give it to the poor in order to have treasure in heaven?

Philosophically Correct.

"The law that discourages the suicide of a damphool is a bad law. The legislature owes something to society." So says M. Grier Kidder in the Truth Seeker.

An Illegitimate World.

Now there is great lamentation because no record can be found of Adam and Eve's marriage. Are we all illegitimate? That is the great question which should convulse the world.

The Pantheism of Modern Science.

By F. E. Titus, Barrister,
Of Toronto, Canada.

Introduction.

In his introduction to "Studies in Spectrum Analysis," Sir Norman Lockyer points out that a change of scientific opinion is a healthy sign, indicating research and progress. He says: "The work of the true man of science is a perpetual striving after a better and closer knowledge of the planet on which his lot is cast, and of the universe in the vastness of which that planet is lost. The only way of doing this effectually is to proceed as gradually, and therefore as surely as possible, along the dim unirodden ground lying beyond the known."

After instancing a few of the rich harvests of knowledge which had been gathered from an exceeding small germ of thought, he continues, "Each step of this kind has more firmly knit the universe together, has welded it into a more and more perfect whole, and has enhanced the marvelous beauty of its structure. Science can never be so flourishing as when she is changing her opinions, because her opinions can never be changed unless she has acquired a number of new truths."

The closing part of this century has been remarkable for the diligence with which our scientists have scrutinized every phenomenon of nature and the immense fund of fresh facts which has rewarded their researches. We need not, therefore, be surprised to find that some very radical changes have taken place in the opinions held by the leading exponents of scientific thought in reference to the nature of those sources from which phenomena are produced.

These changes of thought, so far as the main body of scientific opinion is concerned, are usually so gradual in their operation that the movement is imperceptible until it is accomplished. Looking back over the records of years in which radical changes have been made, it is impossible oftentimes to lay the hand upon the time when the transition from the old to the new first became an established fact. There is a gradually dawning recognition of the truth. At first tentatively put forward, it commends itself to an ever increasing number, until, without any show of hands, it is recognized that the majority of the intellectual electorate, who rule by quality and not by quantity, have ratified the change. But even long before the new position has been accepted as orthodox science and the old position abandoned, fresh theories are being propounded, fresh data is being gathered by the tireless energy of the searchers into nature's secrets. Nor can we speak of the acceptance of a theory as though the vast body of scientists were a unit which speaks with one voice. Fortunately scientists are not automata, and there are very considerable and healthy differences of opinion upon the most fundamental propositions. So that at no time can it be asserted that any theory is held by all the votaries of the many branches of science. Since science rejoices in the absence of a creed, there must always be a large margin left for those who do not agree with a statement of scientific conclusion, especially since science is continually advancing. On one hand we have those who have not yet reached the conclusions accepted by the vast body of students. On the other hand, there are always those advanced intellects who, leaving behind them settled conclusions from verified facts, are already advancing through new experimental research, to more profound statements, to wider generalizations of nature's laws. The tendency of the trend of scientific thought is therefore always a more profitable object of study than the consideration merely of accepted theories, and that study finds its most fruitful field in the declarations and the propositions of recognized leaders in scientific circles.

If we can by this means discover some common point towards which the streams of investigation converge, we may with some confidence anticipate that that point of convergence will ere long be recognized by an ever increasing number as one of the accepted theories of modern science.

The value of such a looking into the future is self-evident. As I will attempt to show later, this generalization from experience has led to the discovery of most important facts, which otherwise might have long remained in the terra incognita of science.

It is true that in thus anticipating the conclusions of orthodox science one runs counter to that large school of physicists who would banish logic from the realm of physics, and who through some peculiar view of things regard a deduction as an enemy of science; as though the creation of man's high function (reason) was a sheer waste of material by our good mother nature. Now while every one must recognize the folly of endeavoring to bend facts so that they will support preconceived opinions, it ought not to be forgotten that a refusal to recognize possible explanations is no less foolish. The "sixth sense" (reason) is surely of equal value, to say the least, with any of the other five upon whose evidence science is wont to rely.

In this essay an attempt will be made to collect and collate some of the facts recently verified by modern investigators and the conclusions to which we are necessarily led thereby.

In order to discern not only the new tone but also the radical departure which has taken and is taking place, it is necessary to recall to our minds the position formerly taken. The army of science in order to record the length of its march, must recall its old bivouac. At a time so recent that it is within the memory of all, the man of science had arrived at the conclusion that there were two basic elements in the universe, and all phenomena were thought to be referable to their interaction. These two were Matter and Motion. With few exceptions all physicists united in regarding the ultimate constituents of matter as absolutely indivisible, inert, inelastic, dead atoms.

Motion was by many regarded as a characteristic of the matter, while others, naming it force, thought it to be an independent, substantial entity, which is not a property of matter, otherwise than by its power to act upon it. Force, according to this school, resides not in the atoms, but in the space between them. This force was pictured as blind. Neither life nor intelligence was attributed to it. These latter were deemed to have been evolved in some unknown and undiscoverable operation of this blind force upon dead matter. No attempt was made to formulate any explanation which would account for the bringing into existence of life and mentality, nor was it thought that the existence of life involved the co-existence of intelligence. Intelligence was a later product. The order of things in point of time was first matter and motion (or force); next life, and lastly intelligence. As to force, investigation had not yet shown any connection between its various forms, and each was looked upon as a separate entity not necessarily bearing any relation to the other forces. There was no apparent link between light and sound; heat and magnetism were total strangers to each other. Such were, briefly, the views formerly accepted by the leaders of scientific thought.

A most radical, though gradual, change has taken place. The following pages will attempt to show, by extracts from the utterances and writings of acknowledged leaders of present-day science, that a new school of thought is now growing up whose ideas, when definitely formulated, will be found to be at an almost entire variance with that which formerly obtained. This new school finds, as a result of its investigations and conclusions, that the hard, indivisible, inelastic, ultimate particle of matter must at last give way to and is resolved into a center of force operating in a relatively homogeneous substance; instead of inertia, continual change with an inherent process of transformation is observed. It has been discovered that there is but one force and that its various forms are linked together by the infinite rates of vibration, those rates expressing themselves in harmony with the grade of the medium of matter through which they are sensed. Consciousness has been found to be a third factor equally fundamental with matter and force. So that instead of the former duality we now have the trinity of science, while life must apparently be considered as an inseparable concomitant of the three.

The evidences of the existence of life and consciousness have been traced gradually backward through the lower forms of the vegetable kingdom, where has been found the presence of vitality possessing selective capacity, into the so-called inorganic world of the mineral kingdom, even to the very elements themselves where similar selective and directive power has been discovered.

The theory of dead matter and blind force has been displaced by the recognition of ever-present life and infinite grades of consciousness. Equally important has been the gradually strengthening conviction that these various factors in nature's problems are not isolated, each standing alone, unrelated to the others, but that each may rather be considered as simply an aspect of one great reality of which empirical scientific research can reveal nothing save as it is manifested through its trinity of aspects.

The Value of Theorization.

Before taking up the consideration of the main question it may be well to attempt to realize the value of the working hypothesis which our scientific friends utilize to the full, and incidentally the merits of all theorization, for all through our process of learning we find that the verified facts of one individual, must be to another, until he has developed the power to also verify them, mere hypotheses, to be worked upon to just the extent that they seem reasonable and in proportion to the confidence which he has in the one who proclaims them. The working hypotheses of one generation and one stage of evolution, are the verified facts of a later generation and of a more advanced mental perception. The mathematical rules which the schoolboy used because of his confidence in his teacher, or his fear of the rod, are to him at first mere hypotheses, but to his teacher they are, as they may be to him subsequently, the most certain of facts. We progress in the larger school of life—in the academy of nature—in much the same way; by working out and verifying nature's rules, discovered and declared to us by those more advanced than we. In the one case, as in the other, rapid progress is accomplished only by working upon the rules thus laid down until we have by our own experience demonstrated that the rule is true or discovered wherein it is false. Facts having been collected by slow and tedious processes where the "sublime patience of the scientist" has been exhibited, it becomes necessary to relate those facts to each other, to find the underlying laws which unite them, and by thus finding the law, making possible predictions as to its future operations. In this endeavor to find their co-relation, the value of the working hypothesis is shown, and its use invoked. The mind leaps, as it were, from the isolated facts to the law which binds them. An explanation is invented. If it fits all the facts, it is, temporarily at least, accepted. It remains good until one of two things happens, either new facts are discovered which are inconsistent with the explanation or some more simple and therefore more reasonable solution is found. If the former occurs, then the inventive faculty of the human mind is again called into requisition, modifications of the hypothesis are made or possibly an entirely new light dawns upon the investigator and a clearer approach to the truth is made. But all progress is heralded by the exercise of the power of theorization.

What is a theory? It is a more or less intelligible and rational explanation of things. It serves to relate cause and effect. Every explanation is a theory. Every accounting for things is a theory. The power to theorize is one of those powers the possession of which in a marked degree distinguishes the human being from the animal, the civilized from the savage, the wise and learned from the ignorant and foolish. Instead of being a term of reproach, the power to theorize, in other words, reason and explain, is an indication of the highest mental development. In the words of Herbert Spencer, "In the formation of a theory we have the highest condition of the human mind." The ignorant savage is able to theorize to but a limited extent. He has not foresight or prudence. He cannot look forward into the future; he lives but from hand to mouth. As we advance in mental strength we theorize more and more as the mental vigor grows. The more highly developed the man the stronger his power of theorization. Holder, in his life of Charles Darwin, says: "Why was Darwin so much greater than others? For one thing—because he had the genius of scientific hypothesis."

The speculations of the man of science are usually an argument in petto, in which the law of analogy is the major premiss, observed facts the minor, and the proposed theory is the deduction. The existence of a theory, when true, often serves to bring about the discovery of new facts, for instance, the discovery of the fifth satellite of Jupiter is said to have taken place as the result of the theorizing of one of our best known Toronto amateur astronomers (Mr. A. Elvins). When the great red spot on Jupiter was noticed by the astronomers in 1878, Mr. Elvins suggested that the planet was ejecting matter which would become a satellite. Thirteen years later, reasoning from the data which was accessible to him, he came to the conclusion that the matter composing the spot was in reality a new satellite. He called the attention of Prof. Barnard to his opinion, and in 1892 Prof. Barnard, by observation confirmed the theory. To Mr. Elvin's intuitive perception and reasoning belongs a very large share of the honor of the discovery.

Another instance of the verification of a theory by a subsequently established fact is found in the discovery by Leverrier and Galle, in 1846, of the planet Neptune. Speaking of this, Prof. Ludwig Buchner, in Appleton's Popular Scientific Monthly, February, 1898, reviewing scientific progress in the closing century, says: "This discovery must be regarded as one of the greatest triumphs of astronomical science, since it was the fruit of a demonstration by mathematical calculations of the existence of a heavenly body, while the actual finding and identification of it were achieved afterwards by means of the telescope."

Tyndall in his address delivered before the British Association at Liverpool in 1870, (which can be found in "Fragments of Science") makes an eloquent plea for the exercise of this high faculty of the human soul. He says: "There are tories even in science who regard imagination as a faculty to be feared and avoided rather than employed; bounded and conditioned by co-operant reason, imagination becomes the mightiest instrument of the human mind. In fact without this power, our knowledge of nature would be a mere tabulation of coexistence and sequences. We would still believe in the succession of day and night, of summer and winter, but the soul of force would be dislodged from our universe; causal relations would disappear, and with them that science which is now binding the facts of nature to an organic whole."

Imagination may be regarded as the faculty or power possessed by the personal consciousness to draw upon the larger fund of experience and knowledge possessed by the immortal ego, and, through that immortal ego, to come in contact to some extent with the universal consciousness of which it is a facet and expression. The picture evoked by the imagination is, as the word itself implies, an image, often very imperfect and very much distorted, but still a partially successful attempt to reflect and reproduce in the physical brain consciousness a picture of the great realities, the fundamental facts and laws of nature which have their basis and lie hidden in the world beyond. Prof. Tyndall intuitively sensed this fountain of imagination for he used these inspired words: "There is in the human intellect a power of expansion—I might almost call it a power of creation—which is brought into play by the simple brooding upon facts. The legend of the spirit brooding over Chaos may have originated in the knowledge of this power."

The Trinity in Unity of Science.

We have spoken of the two great aspects of nature upon which orthodox science built all observable phenomena, that is Matter or Substance, and Motion or Force, for these pairs of terms have been used convertibly.

Thomas Huxley was, I believe, the first of modern scientists of acknowledged standing, to come to the conclusion that a third factor of equal antiquity, as essentially basic as the two already recognized, must be introduced. This third element he recognized as Consciousness.

In order to get a bird's-eye view of the great change which has taken place in scientific conclusions, the most convenient method will be to take each of the three factors separately and note the change of attitude in reference to it; and finally consider what conclusions should be drawn from the facts recently discovered. That the change of attitude is an advance may I think fairly be assumed from the fact that the view in regard to each of the three aspects of things has broadened until each is seen to overlap to some extent the other. This indicates a nearer approach to the very basis of things. Philosophically all nature must in the ultimate be recognized as one. As a matter of fact the scientist—more especially the philosophic scientist—does so regard it. And if this unity be a fact, then we may expect that the advance in scientific knowledge will be accomplished by a clearer and deeper recognition of this fundamental Unity.

Force.

Of those three aspects let us then first consider force and see what changes have taken place as a result of recent experiments.

We formerly spoke of magnetism, electricity, heat, light, sound and nervous energy, as though they were distinct entities, bearing no relation to each other.

Sir William Grove (in the Preface to his essay upon the "Correlation of Physical Forces") says that at the time his essay was written (1842), so far as he was aware, "The theory that the so-called imponderables are affections of ordinary matter, that they are resolvable into motion, that they are to be regarded in their action on matter as forces, and not as specific entities, and that they are capable of mutual reaction, thence alternately acting as cause and effect, had not at that time been publicly advanced." Observation and experiment have shown, however, that each of these forms of energy may be changed into the other. One form of this transmutation is indicated by Doctor Edward L. Youmans in his introduction to "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces." "The star-suns of the remotest galaxies dart their radiation across the universe; and, although the distances are so profound that hundreds of centuries may have been required to traverse them, the impulses of force enter the eye, and, impressing an atomic change upon the nerve, give origin to the sense of sight. Star and nerve-tissue are parts of the same system; stellar and nervous forces are correlated. Nay, more; sensation awakens thought and kindles emotion, so that this wondrous dynamic chain binds into living unity the realms of matter and mind through measureless amplitudes of space and time."

The above extract pictures the conversion of external physical forces into emotion and thought. The inverse operation also takes place, and thought and emotion are changed into various forms of physical force. That form of universal energy which, operating in our nervous organism, we term nerve force, possesses also the power of emitting light. Common examples are found in the lightning bug and in other insects and fishes. The electric eel is one instance of nerve force assuming the form of electricity, and other fishes and animals have the power of giving distinct electric shocks.

Mr. Howard Swan, in the "Electrical Engineer," reports some experiments and discoveries showing the essential unity of several forms of force. After a long course of experiments, Mr. Swan has found that a certain faint, slow-moving phosphorescence, (phosphorescence being simply light without sensible heat) to be observed with suitable precautions in a dark room, within the eyeball or optic nerve (hitherto thought to be due to the circulation of the blood) is sensitive to sound vibrations, being thrown into various movements, which are subject to laws, some of which he has determined by experiment. Musical sounds produce the strongest effect. When the sound is a definite word, a tendency can be noticed in this nerve-light to form patterns more or less geometric. It is also more brilliant at times. Mr. Swan thinks that the variation of apparent luminosity and speed of movement may possibly be subjected to mathematical treatment. The fact that the patterns are to some extent under control of the will by the choice of words and sounds, gives a suggested inter-relationship of what has been regarded usually as mechanical forces with the mental activity of thought.

The conclusion to be drawn from this observation being, that mental action—thoughts—moves and moulds at the same time, the organs of speech and sight, and that this one high quality of force (the mental) expresses itself at one and the same time, as physical form, electricity and nerve action, sound and light.

Tesla makes mention of the same fact. In his lecture before the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, February, 1893, (see "Nikola Tesla, His Inventions," etc., page 295) he said: "It now does not seem improbable that, when by the power of thought an image is evoked, a distinct reflex action, no matter how weak, is exerted upon certain ends of the visual nerves, and therefore upon the retina. * * * Helmholtz has shown that the fundi of the eye are themselves luminous, and he was able to see in total darkness the movement of his arm by the light of his own eyes. * * It is fluorescence of brain action, as it were. * * At times, when a sudden idea or visage presents itself to the intellect, there is a distinct and sometimes painful sensation of luminosity produced in the eye, observable even in broad daylight."

Along the same line are the experiments conducted by Mrs. Watts-Hughes and Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis, demonstrating that sound has both form and color.

Dr. Curtis in "The Scientific American," May 29, 1897, describes the simple mechanism of the instrument which is required to transmute the sound of the human voice into the melody of geometric form—the instrument being a disk covered with a membrane, a small drum-head in fact. After giving the description he informs us that when treated properly the membrane of this instrument is far more sensitive to the exact pitch than the human ear. It may produce one-half, one-quarter and lower fractional tones. For a given instrument the figures are exactly the same for a given tone, but the figures vary with the tension of the membrane and the size of the disk. The quality of the voice which produces the sound is also recorded. The more beautiful the voice and the more perfectly employed with respect to overtone production or harmonic richness, the more delicate and beautiful will be the picture. The picture is as exact as the tuning-fork in determining pitch. Thus is obtained a geometric musical scale. Some of our familiar airs are said to produce most beautiful pictures when thus thrown on this form-producing instrument. For instance, "Home, Sweet Home" is said to produce a perfect picture of ferns and mosses and all the luxuriance of submarine vegetation—a melody of form accompanying the melody of sound. Not only has each tone its characteristic form, but it has also its own peculiar shade of color which many musicians are able to see, and recently an instrument has been invented which, when a note is struck, throws upon a canvass the form and color, so that the color, form and melody are all produced at the same time.

Sir William Grove defines "Correlation" as "A necessary reciprocal production; in other words, that any force capable of producing another may, in its turn, be produced by it." ("Correlation of Physical Forces"). We see how aptly this fact has been illustrated by the experiments above noticed. A wider range of this law than Mr. Grove enumerated has been found. Not only does physical force become transformed into thought, but thought transforms itself into forms of physical force. The realms of matter and mind are correlated. Stellar forms are transmuted into thought. Correlatively, thought passes out into the physical world and is there registered as physical force. Transposing Doctor Youmans' words, "This wondrous dynamic chain of correlation binds into living unity the realms of mind and matter, thought kindles emotion, impresses an atomic change upon the nerve, becomes an impulse of force which, traveling outward, though it may require myriads of millenniums to compass its flight, will exert its influence upon the remotest star which swings in the profound depths of space."

We are enabled to partially trace the path of force as it travels from low to high through varying grades of matter. Both the atmosphere and the ether are now included under the designation matter.

We all know that solid can be converted to liquid, and liquid to gas by the application of heat. The effect of this rise of temperature being increased activity of the particles of matter in the body. The space, which separates the molecules even in the most solid body, is enlarged, and the molecules have freer play, and become more intensely active. In other words, the change from the denser to more rarefied forms of matter is always accompanied by an increase of the rate of vibration of the force which manifests through the form. The higher the temperature of the heat applied the more rarefied is the form of substance. It is found, however, that a low grade of electrical energy will accomplish the dissociation of the chemical atom (the highest grade of matter known to chemists) just as effectively as an extremely high grade of heat—thus linking the action of the two.

A Scale of Vibrations.

Omitting the solid and liquid forms of matter with which we are familiar, let us watch the operation of force in the higher forms of air and ether.

On the average, sound travels through the air at the rate of 1140 feet per second. Sixteen beats per second means that a wave length is one-sixteenth of 1140 feet (about 71 feet). The lowest sound the human ear can hear is said to be one caused by a wave length not longer than about 71 feet, sixteen of which beat upon the drum of the ear within a second of time. The shorter the wave length, the more beats or vibrations there will be in a second and the higher the tone will become. For instance, starting at the sixteen vibrations per second—the lowest audible sound—and gradually increasing the rate of vibration so that the wave lengths are shorter and therefore strike the ear more rapidly, we run up through the scale of sounds until we arrive at the conversational tone of the average male voice at 128 per second. From 256 to 512 is the range of the woman's conversational voice. We thus run up through the scale of sounds until at a rate variously estimated at from 36,000 to 50,000 per second the highest sound the human ear can detect has been reached and so far as our physical organ of hearing can discern, we pass on into eternal silence. All this has been occasioned by the operation of an increasing rate of vibration of force in the substance known as air. But that is not the limit of the rate of vibration. Force continues to increase in its intensity as it passes from air to the form of substance known as ether.

The comparatively coarse air is too gross to serve as the medium for the higher rates of vibration, and the more refined and sensitive ether becomes necessarily the vehicle of expression. We are told that force expresses itself as electricity between about the limit of sound and the rate of nearly thirty-four and one-half billions of vibrations. From thirty-five billions to thirty-five trillions, we are informed, is as an unknown region of vibrations which our senses have not yet been able to detect, measure and identify. At thirty-five trillions of vibrations per second force appears to us in the form of heat. From the lowest degree of heat to the highest each step is marked and caused by an increasingly high rate of vibration in which the sense of touch is affected—as, lower in the scale, the sense of hearing was reached. At about four hundred trillions of vibrations per second we get the first faint low tinge of red. Our sense of sight is now being appealed to. Increasing the rate we are now carried on through higher and higher colors until at about seven hundred and fifty trillions per second of vibration of force in ether the highest violet color is reached and passed. Yet we know there are higher colors than those noted. Our photographic camera has caught the ultra violet or actinic rays even where our physical eye was too dull to penetrate, and the spectroscope reveals rays of light vibrations as high as one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five trillions per second. Recently the Roentgen ray was discovered with its immense rate of hundreds of quadrillions of vibrations per second, and with a wave length which Dr. Fromm estimates to be only one-seventy-fifth of that which is found in the highest violet color. All this points to the probability that there is no limit to the rates of vibration, that our senses cover only the small arc of an infinite circle, that there are octaves of vibrations stretching out in never-ending succession of transcending harmonies and most beautiful sights. One force with infinite rates of vibration, operating in one substance with its infinite grades of density. Sir William Grove, when he refers the causation of all the forms of force to one omnipresent influence, is but voicing the opinion of other scientists.

Thus we see how that force is regarded as fundamentally a unit, though presenting itself as heat, light, nerve fluid, etc., as it operates with greater or lesser intensity, through different physical mechanism; it being possible to change one form or subdivision of force into other forms, sound into color and form, nerve force into light; thought being a link in this endless chain of vibrating force. The whole range of phenomena is due to a difference in the rate of vibration, which difference of rate is accompanied by a corresponding variation in the density of the form of matter through which it manifests.

Gems of Thought.

Perhaps the greatest triumph of all moral writings, including sermons, is that at least they have produced some sweet and innocent sleep.—Arthur Helps.

I choose the noble part of Emerson, when after various disenchantments he exclaims, "I covet the truth." The gladness of true heroism visits the heart of him who is really competent to say this.—John Tyndall.

Human laws exist only to prevent one from injuring another, or others, that is, from violating individual rights or public order. The law has no right to enslave a man; and it does make a slave of that man whose free will is coerced in matters directly concerning himself alone.—Moncure D. Conway.

If in this world there is a figure of perfect purity, it is a mother holding in her thrilled and happy arms her child. The doctrine that woman is the slave or serf of man—whether it comes from heaven or from hell, from God or a demon, from the golden streets of the New Jerusalem or from the very Sodom of perdition—is savagery pure and simple.—Ingersoll.

HIS ANGEL WIFE CAME

And Guided Him on His Journey.

To the Editor:—During a social chat the writer had a few evenings ago with a friend and well-known citizen of Canton, our conversation drifted to the occult or mysterious powers possessed by so many individuals at this age of the world, the close of the nineteenth century. After the writer had related a number of his experiences with denizens of the spirit or unseen world while investigating the truths of Modern Spiritualism, his friend in turn and who is no Spiritualist, or at least does not claim to be, related what he termed some very mysterious experiences.

"Two winters ago," he said, "I went down to Pennsylvania where I lived when a small boy and the nearest railroad station to my destination is twenty-three miles away. From Canton I went by rail to Pittsburg where I changed roads and was landed at a small station about sundown in the most mountainous section of that great state. Upon arriving there I learned that no conveyance could be had to convey me over the mountains to my destination and as I did not care to remain there over night, I concluded to walk since the roads were in fair condition. Getting all the information I could as to the best roads and nearest route, I started out on my long and lonesome journey. I had gone but a few miles, however, when the darkness of night came on, and for the first time I began to think of friends and home, but I had gone too far to turn back, and did not care to put up with a farmer over night (and by the way that section of country) is not settled as thickly as is Ohio) therefore I went on and on and finally came to a cross road, and being undecided which way to turn, I called first upon God and then Maggie, my spirit wife, who had passed to the great beyond a few years ago, to come to me if it were possible for her to do so and guide me on the right road.

"While in an unsettled state of mind as to whether I should turn to the right or to the left, whom should I see but my angel wife. All at once she appeared a few yards from me, dressed in a lovely white robe and beckoned me to follow her. For a moment I was frightened, but all fear soon passed away. I then began to walk faster, hoping to catch up with her, but failed to do so and all of a sudden she disappeared as mysteriously as she came. She was not walking on the ground as I was, but, instead, she seemed to be floating in mid-air and but a few feet above the ground. After going perhaps a mile I came to another cross-road and to my surprise Maggie, my guardian angel, was seen again and again beckoned me to follow her which I willingly did, but had not gone far until she vanished as before. Thus she guided me from hour to hour during that long and lonesome journey, and just before the break of day and I being near my destination, she came to me again and after waving to me a farewell greeting she vanished to be seen no more that night. This story, or rather, those experiences I have but seldom related and then only to intimate friends. I have, however, seen my dear wife often since, sometimes at my bedside during the night, and upon several occasions she has come to me when I visited a certain grove near Canton and when alone."

Now a word to the skeptic or non-believer in spirit return and guidance. If my friend did not see his spirit wife, yet he claims he did and was guided by her hour after hour on that lonely night, who was it or what was it that guided him and led him safely to his journey's end?

"AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?"

Come out into the sun, and air, and
broad blue sky,
And if you hear a katy-did, mark how
it sings;
Inspect its whole anatomy, its legs and wings,
And some good lesson learn in all that passes by.

Have you but breathed the fetid air of pent-up town?
Then come with me and we will go into the wood,
And romp, and play, in all the joy of
freedomhood;
And, if it's autumn, watch brown leaves
come tumbling down.

If winter reigns, we'll club icicles from the trees,
And wash each other's faces in the crystal snow;
And laugh to see our cheeks put on a healthy glow;
And make cow trails in it by walking on our knees.

Should spring send forth the vigor of awaking life,
We'll hunt arbutus on the hill, and by some stream
Pick sky-blue violets, and fern, and lounge and dream,
Far from the marts of men and all their painful strife.

If summer fructify its many fruits and seeds,
And the big sun is sweltering, and
winds are hot,
Then by some shady pool, some paradisal spot,
We will refresh ourselves and talk of men's good deeds.

For man is not all bad—sometimes his acts are vile.
But do we study how our brother to reform?
Are not our statutes made to measure
harm by harm?
Whereas, they should breathe only love,
avoiding guile.

I fear we do misjudge the way when we do make Life answer life, and for so many trifles
rob
Men of their liberty. Brothers, give up
the job!
Our penal plan is scarcely better than the stake!

The days of Bruno long ago were passed; the plow
That had its mould-board made of wood
has lost its use;
While we are tardy to reform the state's abuse!
Where is the social patentee whom we need now?

Another century is here about to dawn,
Let's gird our loins and be our brother's keeper; then
If he do wrong we will reclaim with love; and when
We may do that the animal shall all be gone.

The Pantheism of Modern Science.

By F. E. Titus, Barrister,
Of Toronto, Canada.

Introduction.

In his introduction to "Studies in Spectrum Analysis," Sir Norman Lockyer points out that a change of scientific opinion is a healthy sign, indicating research and progress. He says: "The work of the true man of science is a perpetual striving after a better and closer knowledge of the planet on which his lot is cast, and of the universe in the vastness of which that planet is lost. The only way of doing this effectually is to proceed as gradually, and therefore as surely as possible, along the dim untrodden ground lying beyond the known."

After instancing a few of the rich harvests of knowledge which had been gathered from an exceeding small germ of thought, he continues, "Each step of this kind has more firmly knit the universe together, has welded it into a more and more perfect whole, and has enhanced the marvelous beauty of its structure. Science can never be so flourishing as when she is changing her opinions, because her opinions can never be changed unless she has acquired a number of new truths."

The closing part of this century has been remarkable for the diligence with which our scientists have scrutinized every phenomenon of nature and the immense fund of fresh facts which has rewarded their researches. We need not, therefore, be surprised to find that some very radical changes have taken place in the opinions held by the leading exponents of scientific thought in reference to the nature of those sources from which phenomena are produced.

These changes of thought, so far as the main body of scientific opinion is concerned, are usually so gradual in their operation that the movement is imperceptible until it is accomplished. Looking back over the records of years in which radical changes have been made, it is impossible oftentimes to lay the hand upon the time when the transition from the old to the new first became an established fact. There is a gradually dawning recognition of the truth. At first tentatively put forward, it commends itself to an ever increasing number, until, without any show of hands, it is recognized that the majority of the intellectual electorate, who rule by quality and not by quantity, have ratified the change. But even long before the new position has been accepted as orthodox science and the old position abandoned, fresh theories are being propounded, fresh data is being gathered by the tireless energy of the searchers into nature's secrets. Nor can we speak of the acceptance of a theory as though the vast body of scientists were a unit which speaks with one voice. Fortunately scientists are not automata, and there are very considerable and healthy differences of opinion upon the most fundamental propositions. So that at no time can it be asserted that any theory is held by all the votaries of the many branches of science. Since science rejoices in the absence of a creed, there must always be a large margin left for those who do not agree with a statement of scientific conclusion, especially since science is continually advancing. On one hand we have those who have not yet reached the conclusions accepted by the vast body of students. On the other hand, there are always those advanced intellects who, leaving behind them settled conclusions from verified facts, are already advancing through new experimental research, to more profound statements, to wider generalizations of nature's laws. The tendency of the trend of scientific thought is therefore always a more profitable object of study than the consideration merely of accepted theories, and that study finds its most fruitful field in the declarations and the propositions of recognized leaders in scientific circles.

If we can by this means discover some common point towards which the streams of investigation converge, we may with some confidence anticipate that that point of convergence will ere long be recognized by an ever increasing number as one of the accepted theories of modern science.

The value of such a looking into the future is self-evident. As I will attempt to show later, this generalization from experience has led to the discovery of most important facts, which otherwise might have long remained in the terra incognita of science.

It is true that in thus anticipating the conclusions of orthodox science one runs counter to that large school of physicists who would banish logic from the realm of physics, and who through some peculiar view of things regard a deduction as an enemy of science; as though the creation of man's high function (reason) was a sheer waste of material by our good mother nature. Now while every one must recognize the folly of endeavoring to bend facts so that they will support preconceived opinions, it ought not to be forgotten that a refusal to recognize possible explanations is no less foolish. The "sixth sense" (reason) is surely of equal value, to say the least, with any of the other five upon whose evidence science is wont to rely.

In this essay an attempt will be made to collect and collate some of the facts recently verified by modern investigators and the conclusions to which we are necessarily led thereby.

In order to discern not only the new tone but also the radical departure which has taken and is taking place, it is necessary to recall to our minds the position formerly taken. The army of science in order to record the length of its march, must recall its old bivouac. At a time so recent that it is within the memory of all, the man of science had arrived at the conclusion that there were two basic elements in the universe, and all phenomena were thought to be referable to their interaction. These two were Matter and Motion. With few exceptions all physicists united in regarding the ultimate constituents of matter as absolutely indivisible, inert, inelastic, dead atoms.

Motion was by many regarded as a characteristic of the matter, while others, naming it force, thought it to be an independent, substantial entity, which is not a property of matter, otherwise than by its power to act upon it. Force, according to this school, resides not in the atoms, but in the space between them. This force was pictured as blind. Neither life nor intelligence was attributed to it. These latter were deemed to have been evolved in some unknown and undiscoverable operation of this blind force upon dead matter. No attempt was made to formulate any explanation which would account for the bringing into existence of life and mentality, nor was it thought that the existence of life involved the co-existence of intelligence. Intelligence was a later product. The order of things in point of time was first matter and motion (or force); next life, and lastly intelligence. As to force, investigation had not yet shown any connection between its various forms, and each was looked upon as a separate entity not necessarily bearing any relation to the other forces. There was no apparent link between light and sound; heat and magnetism were total strangers to each other. Such were, briefly, the views formerly accepted by the leaders of scientific thought.

A most radical, though gradual, change has taken place. The following pages will attempt to show, by extracts from the utterances and writings of acknowledged leaders of present-day science, that a new school of thought is now growing up whose ideas, when definitely formulated, will be found to be at an almost entire variance with that which formerly obtained. This new school finds, as a result of its investigations and conclusions, that the hard, indivisible, inelastic, ultimate particle of matter must at last give way to and is resolved into a center of force operating in a relatively homogeneous substance; instead of inertia, continual change with an inherent process of transformation is observed. It has been discovered that there is but one force and that its various forms are linked together by the infinite rates of vibration, those rates expressing themselves in harmony with the grade of the medium of matter through which they are sensed. Consciousness has been found to be a third factor equally fundamental with matter and force. So that instead of the former duality we now have the trinity of science, while life must apparently be considered as an inseparable concomitant of the three.

The evidences of the existence of life and consciousness have been traced gradually backward through the lower forms of the vegetable kingdom, where has been found the presence of vitality possessing selective capacity, into the so-called inorganic world of the mineral kingdom, even to the very elements themselves where similar selective and directive power has been discovered.

The theory of dead matter and blind force has been displaced by the recognition of ever-present life and infinite grades of consciousness. Equally important has been the gradually strengthening conviction that these various factors in nature's problems are not isolated, each standing alone, unrelated to the others, but that each may rather be considered as simply an aspect of one great reality of which empirical scientific research can reveal nothing save as it is manifested through its trinity of aspects.

The Value of Theorization.

Before taking up the consideration of the main question it may be well to attempt to realize the value of the working hypothesis which our scientific friends utilize to the full, and incidentally the merits of all theorization, for all through our process of learning we find that the verified facts of one individual, must be to another, until he has developed the power to also verify them, mere hypotheses, to be worked upon to just the extent that they seem reasonable and in proportion to the confidence which he has in the one who proclaims them. The working hypotheses of one generation and one stage of evolution, are the verified facts of a later generation and of a more advanced mental perception. The mathematical rules which the schoolboy used because of his confidence in his teacher, or his fear of the rod, are to him at first mere hypotheses, but to his teacher they are, as they may be to him subsequently, the most certain of facts. We progress in the larger school of life—in the academy of nature—in much the same way; by working out and verifying nature's rules, discovered and declared to us by those more advanced than we. In the one case, as in the other, rapid progress is accomplished only by working upon the rules thus laid down until we have by our own experience demonstrated that the rule is true or discovered wherein it is false. Facts having been collected by slow and tedious processes where the "sublime patience of the scientist" has been exhibited, it becomes necessary to relate those facts to each other, to find the underlying laws which unite them, and by thus finding the law, making possible predictions as to its future operations. In this endeavor to find their co-relation, the value of the working hypothesis is shown, and its use invoked. The mind leaps, as it were, from the isolated facts to the law which binds them. An explanation is invented. If it fits all the facts, it is, temporarily at least, accepted. It remains good until one of two things happens, either new facts are discovered which are inconsistent with the explanation or some more simple and therefore more reasonable solution is found. If the former occurs, then the inventive faculty of the human mind is again called into requisition, modifications of the hypothesis are made or possibly an entirely new light dawns upon the investigator and a clearer approach to the truth is made. But all progress is heralded by the exercise of the power of theorization.

What is a theory? It is a more or less intelligible and rational explanation of things. It serves to relate cause and effect. Every explanation is a theory. Every accounting for things is a theory. The power to theorize is one of those powers the possession of which in a marked degree distinguishes the human being from the animal, the civilized from the savage, the wise and learned from the ignorant and foolish. Instead of being a term of reproach, the power to theorize, in other words, reason and explain, is an indication of the highest mental development. In the words of Herbert Spencer, "In the formation of a theory we have the highest condition of the human mind." The ignorant savage is able to theorize to but a limited extent. He has not foresight or prudence. He cannot look forward into the future; he lives but from hand to mouth. As we advance in mental strength we theorize more and more as the mental vigor grows. The more highly developed the man the stronger his power of theorization. Holder, in his life of Charles Darwin, says: "Why was Darwin so much greater than others? For one thing—because he had the genius of scientific hypothesis."

The speculations of the man of science are usually an argument in petto, in which the law of analogy is the major premiss, observed facts the minor, and the proposed theory is the deduction. The existence of a theory, when true, often serves to bring about the discovery of new facts, for instance, the discovery of the fifth satellite of Jupiter is said to have taken place as the result of the theorizing of one of our best known Toronto amateur astronomers (Mr. A. Elvins). When the great red spot on Jupiter was noticed by the astronomers in 1878, Mr. Elvins suggested that the planet was ejecting matter which would become a satellite. Thirteen years later, reasoning from the data which was accessible to him, he came to the conclusion that the matter composing the spot was in reality a new satellite. He called the attention of Prof. Barnard to his opinion, and in 1892 Prof. Barnard, by observation confirmed the theory. To Mr. Elvin's intuitive perception and reasoning belongs a very large share of the honor of the discovery.

Another instance of the verification of a theory by a subsequently established fact is found in the discovery by Leverrier and Galle, in 1846, of the planet Neptune. Speaking of this, Prof. Ludwig Buchner, in Appleton's Popular Scientific Monthly, February, 1898, reviewing scientific progress in the closing century, says: "This discovery must be regarded as one of the greatest triumphs of astronomical science, since it was the fruit of a demonstration by mathematical calculations of the existence of a heavenly body, while the actual finding and identification of it were achieved afterwards by means of the telescope."

Tyndall in his address delivered before the British Association at Liverpool in 1870, (which can be found in "Fragments of Science") makes an eloquent plea for the exercise of this high faculty of the human soul. He says: "There are tories even in science who regard imagination as a faculty to be feared and avoided rather than employed; bounded and conditioned by co-operant reason, imagination becomes the mightiest instrument of the human mind. In fact without this power, our knowledge of nature would be a mere tabulation of coexistence and sequences. We would still believe in the succession of day and night, of summer and winter, but the soul of force would be dislodged from our universe; causal relations would disappear, and with them that science which is now binding the facts of nature to an organic whole."

Imagination may be regarded as the faculty or power possessed by the personal consciousness to draw upon the larger fund of experience and knowledge possessed by the immortal ego, and, through that immortal ego, to come in contact to some extent with the universal consciousness of which it is a facet and expression. The picture evoked by the imagination is, as the word itself implies, an image, often very imperfect and very much distorted, but still a partially successful attempt to reflect and reproduce in the physical brain consciousness a picture of the great realities, the fundamental facts and laws of nature which have their basis and lie hidden in the world beyond. Prof. Tyndall intuitively sensed this fountain of imagination for he used these inspired words: "There is in the human intellect a power of expansion—I might almost call it a power of creation—which is brought into play by the simple brooding upon facts. The legend of the spirit brooding over Chaos may have originated in the knowledge of this power."

The Trinity in Unity of Science.

We have spoken of the two great aspects of nature upon which orthodox science built all observable phenomena, that is Matter or Substance, and Motion or Force, for these pairs of terms have been used convertibly.

Thomas Huxley was, I believe, the first of modern scientists of acknowledged standing, to come to the conclusion that a third factor of equal antiquity, as essentially basic as the two already recognized, must be introduced. This third element he recognized as Consciousness.

In order to get a bird's-eye view of the great change which has taken place in scientific conclusions, the most convenient method will be to take each of the three factors separately and note the change of attitude in reference to it; and finally consider what conclusions should be drawn from the facts recently discovered. That the change of attitude is an advance may I think fairly be assumed from the fact that the view in regard to each of the three aspects of things has broadened until each is seen to overlap to some extent the other. This indicates a nearer approach to the very basis of things. Philosophically all nature must in the ultimate be recognized as one. As a matter of fact the scientist—more especially the philosophic scientist—does so regard it. And if this unity be a fact, then we may expect that the advance in scientific knowledge will be accomplished by a clearer and deeper recognition of this fundamental Unity.

Force.

Of those three aspects let us then first consider force and see what changes have taken place as a result of recent experiments.

We formerly spoke of magnetism, electricity, heat, light, sound and nervous energy, as though they were distinct entities, bearing no relation to each other.

Sir William Grove (in the Preface to his essay upon the "Correlation of Physical Forces") says that at the time his essay was written (1842), so far as he was aware, "The theory that the so-called imponderables are affections of ordinary matter, that they are resolvable into motion, that they are to be regarded in their action on matter as forces, and not as specific entities, and that they are capable of mutual reaction, thence alternately acting as cause and effect, had not at that time been publicly advanced." Observation and experiment have shown, however, that each of these forms of energy may be changed into the other. One form of this transmutation is indicated by Doctor Edward L. Youmans in his introduction to "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces." "The star-suns of the remotest galaxies dart their radiation across the universe; and, although the distances are so profound that hundreds of centuries may have been required to traverse them, the impulses of force enter the eye, and, impressing an atomic change upon the nerve, give origin to the sense of sight. Star and nerve-tissue are parts of the same system; stellar and nervous forces are correlated. Nay, more; sensation awakens thought and kindles emotion, so that this wondrous dynamic chain binds into living unity the realms of matter and mind through measureless amplitudes of space and time."

The above extract pictures the conversion of external physical forces into emotion and thought. The inverse operation also takes place, and thought and emotion are changed into various forms of physical force. That form of universal energy which, operating in our nervous organism, we term nerve force, possesses also the power of emitting light. Common examples are found in the lightning bug and in other insects and fishes. The electric eel is one instance of nerve force assuming the form of electricity, and other fishes and animals have the power of giving distinct electric shocks.

Mr. Howard Swan, in the "Electrical Engineer," reports some experiments and discoveries showing the essential unity of several forms of force. After a long course of experiments, Mr. Swan has found that a certain faint, slow-moving phosphorescence, (phosphorescence being simply light without sensible heat) to be observed with suitable precautions in a dark room, within the eyeball or optic nerve (hitherto thought to be due to the circulation of the blood) is sensitive to sound vibrations, being thrown into various movements, which are subject to laws, some of which he has determined by experiment. Musical sounds produce the strongest effect. When the sound is a definite word, a tendency can be noticed in this nerve-light to form patterns more or less geometric. It is also more brilliant at times. Mr. Swan thinks that the variation of apparent luminosity and speed of movement may possibly be subjected to mathematical treatment. The fact that the patterns are to some extent under control of the will by the choice of words and sounds, gives a suggested inter-relationship of what has been regarded usually as mechanical forces with the mental activity of thought.

The conclusion to be drawn from this observation being, that mental action—thoughts—moves and moulds at the same time, the organs of speech and sight, and that this one high quality of force (the mental) expresses itself at one and the same time, as physical form, electricity and nerve action, sound and light.

Tesla makes mention of the same fact. In his lecture before the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, February, 1893, (see "Nikola Tesla, His Inventions," etc., page 295) he said: "It now does not seem improbable that, when by the power of thought an image is evoked, a distinct reflex action, no matter how weak, is exerted upon certain ends of the visual nerves, and therefore upon the retina. * * * Helmholtz has shown that the fundi of the eye are themselves luminous, and he was able to see in total darkness the movement of his arm by the light of his own eyes. * * It is fluorescence of brain action, as it were. * * At times, when a sudden idea or visage presents itself to the intellect, there is a distinct and sometimes painful sensation of luminosity produced in the eye, observable even in broad daylight."

Along the same line are the experiments conducted by Mrs. Watts-Hughes and Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis, demonstrating that sound has both form and color.

Dr. Curtis in "The Scientific American," May 29, 1897, describes the simple mechanism of the instrument which is required to transmute the sound of the human voice into the melody of geometric form—the instrument being a disk covered with a membrane, a small drum-head in fact. After giving the description he informs us that when treated properly the membrane of this instrument is far more sensitive to the exact pitch than the human ear. It may produce one-half, one-quarter and lower fractional tones. For a given instrument the figures are exactly the same for a given tone, but the figures vary with the tension of the membrane and the size of the disk. The quality of the voice which produces the sound is also recorded. The more beautiful the voice and the more perfectly employed with respect to overtone production or harmonic richness, the more delicate and beautiful will be the picture. The picture is as exact as the tuning-fork in determining pitch. Thus is obtained a geometric musical scale. Some of our familiar airs are said to produce most beautiful pictures when thus thrown on this form-producing instrument. For instance, "Home, Sweet Home" is said to produce a perfect picture of ferns and mosses and all the luxuriance of submarine vegetation—a melody of form accompanying the melody of sound. Not only has each tone its characteristic form, but it has also its own peculiar shade of color which many musicians are able to see, and recently an instrument has been invented which, when a note is struck, throws upon a canvass the form and color, so that the color, form and melody are all produced at the same time.

Sir William Grove defines "Correlation" as "A necessary reciprocal production; in other words, that any force capable of producing another may, in its turn, be produced by it." ("Correlation of Physical Forces"). We see how aptly this fact has been illustrated by the experiments above noticed. A wider range of this law than Mr. Grove enumerated has been found. Not only does physical force become transformed into thought, but thought transforms itself into forms of physical force. The realms of matter and mind are correlated. Stellar forms are transmuted into thought. Correlatively, thought passes out into the physical world and is there registered as physical force. Transposing Doctor Youmans' words, "This wondrous dynamic chain of correlation binds into living unity the realms of mind and matter, thought kindles emotion, impresses an atomic change upon the nerve, becomes an impulse of force which, traveling outward, though it may require myriads of millenniums to compass its flight, will exert its influence upon the remotest star which swings in the profound depths of space."

We are enabled to partially trace the path of force as it travels from low to high through varying grades of matter. Both the atmosphere and the ether are now included under the designation matter.

We all know that solid can be converted to liquid, and liquid to gas by the application of heat. The effect of this rise of temperature being increased activity of the particles of matter in the body. The space, which separates the molecules even in the most solid body, is enlarged, and the molecules have freer play, and become more intensely active. In other words, the change from the denser to more rarefied forms of matter is always accompanied by an increase of the rate of vibration of the force which manifests through the form. The higher the temperature of the heat applied the more rarefied is the form of substance. It is found, however, that a low grade of electrical energy will accomplish the dissociation of the chemical atom (the highest grade of matter known to chemists) just as effectively as an extremely high grade of heat—thus linking the action of the two.

A Scale of Vibrations.

Omitting the solid and liquid forms of matter with which we are familiar, let us watch the operation of force in the higher forms of air and ether.

On the average, sound travels through the air at the rate of 1140 feet per second. Sixteen beats per second means that a wave length is one-sixteenth of 1140 feet (about 71 feet). The lowest sound the human ear can hear is said to be one caused by a wave length not longer than about 71 feet, sixteen of which beat upon the drum of the ear within a second of time. The shorter the wave length, the more beats or vibrations there will be in a second and the higher the tone will become. For instance, starting at the sixteen vibrations per second—the lowest audible sound—and gradually increasing the rate of vibration so that the wave lengths are shorter and therefore strike the ear more rapidly, we run up through the scale of sounds until we arrive at the conversational tone of the average male voice at 128 per second. From 256 to 512 is the range of the woman's conversational voice. We thus run up through the scale of sounds until at a rate variously estimated at from 36,000 to 50,000 per second the highest sound the human ear can detect has been reached and so far as our physical organ of hearing can discern, we pass on into eternal silence. All this has been occasioned by the operation of an increasing rate of vibration of force in the substance known as air. But that is not the limit of the rate of vibration. Force continues to increase in its intensity as it passes from air to the form of substance known as ether.

The comparatively coarse air is too gross to serve as the medium for the higher rates of vibration, and the more refined and sensitive ether becomes necessarily the vehicle of expression. We are told that force expresses itself as electricity between about the limit of sound and the rate of nearly thirty-four and one-half billions of vibrations. From thirty-five billions to thirty-five trillions, we are informed, is as an unknown region of vibrations which our senses have not yet been able to detect, measure and identify. At thirty-five trillions of vibrations per second force appears to us in the form of heat. From the lowest degree of heat to the highest each step is marked and caused by an increasingly high rate of vibration in which the sense of touch is affected—as, lower in the scale, the sense of hearing was reached. At about four hundred trillions of vibrations per second we get the first faint low tinge of red. Our sense of sight is now being appealed to. Increasing the rate we are now carried on through higher and higher colors until at about seven hundred and fifty trillions per second of vibration of force in ether the highest violet color is reached and passed. Yet we know there are higher colors than those noted. Our photographic camera has caught the ultra violet or actinic rays even where our physical eye was too dull to penetrate, and the spectroscope reveals rays of light vibrations as high as one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five trillions per second. Recently the Roentgen ray was discovered with its immense rate of hundreds of quadrillions of vibrations per second, and with a wave length which Dr. Fromm estimates to be only one-seventy-fifth of that which is found in the highest violet color. All this points to the probability that there is no limit to the rates of vibration, that our senses cover only the small arc of an infinite circle, that there are octaves of vibrations stretching out in never-ending succession of transcending harmonies and most beautiful sights. One force with infinite rates of vibration, operating in one substance with its infinite grades of density. Sir William Grove, when he refers the causation of all the forms of force to one omnipresent influence, is but voicing the opinion of other scientists.

Thus we see how that force is regarded as fundamentally a unit, though presenting itself as heat, light, nerve fluid, etc., as it operates with greater or lesser intensity, through different physical mechanism; it being possible to change one form or subdivision of force into other forms, sound into color and form, nerve force into light; thought being a link in this endless chain of vibrating force. The whole range of phenomena is due to a difference in the rate of vibration, which difference of rate is accompanied by a corresponding variation in the density of the form of matter through which it manifests.

Gems of Thought.

Perhaps the greatest triumph of all moral writings, including sermons, is that at least they have produced some sweet and innocent sleep.—Arthur Helps.

I choose the noble part of Emerson, when after various disenchantments he exclaims, "I covet the truth." The gladness of true heroism visits the heart of him who is really competent to say this.—John Tyndall.

Human laws exist only to prevent one from injuring another, or others, that is, from violating individual rights or public order. The law has no right to enslave a man; and it does make a slave of that man whose free will is coerced in matters directly concerning himself alone.—Moncure D. Conway.

If in this world there is a figure of perfect purity, it is a mother holding in her thrilled and happy arms her child. The doctrine that woman is the slave or serf of man—whether it comes from heaven or from hell, from God or a demon, from the golden streets of the New Jerusalem or from the very Sodom of perdition—is savagery pure and simple.—Ingersoll.

HIS ANGEL WIFE CAME

And Guided Him on His Journey.

To the Editor:—During a social chat the writer had a few evenings ago with a friend and well-known citizen of Canton, our conversation drifted to the occult or mysterious powers possessed by so many individuals at this age of the world, the close of the nineteenth century. After the writer had related a number of his experiences with denizens of the spirit or unseen world while investigating the truths of Modern Spiritualism, his friend in turn and who is no Spiritualist, or at least does not claim to be, related what he termed some very mysterious experiences.

"Two winters ago," he said, "I went down to Pennsylvania where I lived when a small boy and the nearest railroad station to my destination is twenty-three miles away. From Canton I went by rail to Pittsburg where I changed roads and was landed at a small station about sundown in the most mountainous section of that great state. Upon arriving there I learned that no conveyance could be had to convey me over the mountains to my destination and as I did not care to remain there over night, I concluded to walk since the roads were in fair condition. Getting all the information I could as to the best roads and nearest route, I started out on my long and lonesome journey. I had gone but a few miles, however, when the darkness of night came on, and for the first time I began to think of friends and home, but I had gone too far to turn back, and did not care to put up with a farmer over night (and by the way that section of country) is not settled as thickly as is Ohio) therefore I went on and on and finally came to a cross road, and being undecided which way to turn, I called first upon God and then Maggie, my spirit wife, who had passed to the great beyond a few years ago, to come to me if it were possible for her to do so and guide me on the right road.

"While in an unsettled state of mind as to whether I should turn to the right or to the left, whom should I see but my angel wife. All at once she appeared a few yards from me, dressed in a lovely white robe and beckoned me to follow her. For a moment I was frightened, but all fear soon passed away. I then began to walk faster, hoping to catch up with her, but failed to do so and all of a sudden she disappeared as mysteriously as she came. She was not walking on the ground as I was, but, instead, she seemed to be floating in mid-air and but a few feet above the ground. After going perhaps a mile I came to another cross-road and to my surprise Maggie, my guardian angel, was seen again and again beckoned me to follow her which I willingly did, but had not gone far until she vanished as before. Thus she guided me from hour to hour during that long and lonesome journey, and just before the break of day and I being near my destination, she came to me again and after waving to me a farewell greeting she vanished to be seen no more that night. This story, or rather, those experiences I have but seldom related and then only to intimate friends. I have, however, seen my dear wife often since, sometimes at my bedside during the night, and upon several occasions she has come to me when I visited a certain grove near Canton and when alone."

Now a word to the skeptic or non-believer in spirit return and guidance. If my friend did not see his spirit wife, yet he claims he did and was guided by her hour after hour on that lonely night, who was it or what was it that guided him and led him safely to his journey's end? E. R. KIDD.

"AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?"

Come out into the sun, and air, and
broad blue sky,
And if you hear a katy-did, mark how
it sings;
Inspect its whole anatomy, its legs and
wings,
And some good lesson learn in all that passes by.

Have you but breathed the fetid air of pent-up town?
Then come with me and we will go into the wood,
And romp, and play, in all the joy of
freedomhood;
And, if it's autumn, watch brown leaves
come tumbling down.

If winter reigns, we'll club icicles from the trees,
And wash each other's faces in the
crystal snow;
And laugh to see our cheeks put on a
healthy glow;
And make cow trails in it by walking on
our knees.

Should spring send forth the vigor of
awaking life,
We'll hunt arbutus on the hill, and by
some stream
Pick sky-blue violets, and fern, and
lounge and dream,
Far from the marts of men and all their painful strife.

If summer fructify its many fruits and
seeds,
And the big sun is sweltering, and
winds are hot,
Then by some shady pool, some paradisal spot,
We will refresh ourselves and talk of
men's good deeds.

For man is not all bad—sometimes his
acts are vile.
But do we study how our brother to reform?
Are not our statutes made to measure
harm by harm?
Whereas, they should breathe only love,
avoiding guile.

I fear we do misjudge the way when we do make Life answer life, and for so many trifles
rob
Men of their liberty. Brothers, give up
the job!
Our penal plan is scarcely better than the stake!

The days of Bruno long ago were passed; the plow
That had its mould-board made of wood
has lost its use;
While we are tardy to reform the
state's abuse!
Where is the social patentee whom we need now?

Another century is here about to dawn,
Let's gird our loins and be our brother's
keeper; then
If he do wrong we will reclaim with love; and when
We may do that the animal shall all be gone. B. F. SLITER.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

H. F. Coates writes: "I would like to correct a report which has been started by some one and has reached me through several parties. Our meetings have not been discontinued. We are still holding them each Sunday at 3 and 8 p. m., at Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, and will continue to do so. The attendance is good. John K. Hallowell has been secured as speaker and is liked by all. Our afternoon meetings are strictly conference, and all mediums and investigators are invited to come and take a part."

Dr. Ravlin closes his first year's engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia the last Sunday in this month. He has been re-engaged for another year. He leaves with Mrs. Ravlin for Boston, Mass., on the 31st inst. His correspondents will address him care Banner of Light, 9 Bosworth street, until further notice.

Frank T. Ripley has been doing satisfactory work at Fort Wayne, Ind., and has been engaged for June.

E. V. Morse writes: "Lorain, Ohio, can boast, finally, of having the first spiritual or liberal society for many years, if not in her history. The principal organizer, Mrs. J. M. Bryan, late of Paine, O., is entitled to much praise, not only for her success in the organization, indexed in the moral tone of its members, and also their moral desires, as expressed in their efforts during the two months of the existence of the organization; but also in her growing success as the engaged lecturer for the association. The charter name of the society is The Progressive Thought Association, and we extend to all such societies an offer for a hearty co-operation, and would be glad for the privilege to extend the hand of fellowship to any visiting members form other societies."

Mrs. R. W. Barton writes from Rochester, N. Y.: "The First Spiritual Church of Rochester, N. Y., will close their year's work, May 31. I go to Toronto, Canada, for June. My address will be 151 Strachan avenue. I am engaged by the First Church there."

Thos. J. Haynes writes from Muskegon, Mich.: "Dr. A. B. Spinney was with us on last Sunday. He delivered two lectures, subjects: 'What is Life?' What is Death?' They were extremely eloquent and uplifting. Such lectures purify the soul and inspire people to higher and nobler purposes. Mrs. Blake, of Grand Rapids, and Mrs. M. A. Burland, of this place were present and gave some undeniable evidence of psychic power, as well as loving messages from some of the so-called dead. We had large audiences and splendid meetings."

M. E. Taylor, an octogenarian, and a prominent Spiritualist, writes from Santa Barbara, Cal.: "I am in receipt of your brief but kind and truly generous message, also a late copy of your most wonderfully prolific paper, as to the bud, bloom and fruit of advanced and illuminating thought gathered from the scientific schools of earth and heaven for the uplifting and purification of the race, etc. You will therefore please accept my sincere thanks for your brotherly greeting and generous gift."

Dr. B. F. Weythman writes from Memphis, Tenn.: "The Progressive Thinker is my ideal of what a Spiritual paper should be."

Dr. H. A. Cross writes: "A reception will be given to Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, under the auspices of the Sunflower Social Club, an auxiliary to the First Spiritual Church, on Sunday afternoon of June 3, immediately after her afternoon service of the First Spiritual Church, which will be about 4:30 o'clock, and will take place in the banquet hall below, at 77 Thirty-first street. Tickets of admission can be obtained of the committee, who, if called upon, will make any desired explanation. Refreshments will be served, and music and short addresses will be the order of this occasion. A large attendance is desired. Mrs. Cooley will take her departure early in the week on her summer vacation. The names of the committee are Mrs. O. B. Wilson, Mrs. F. J. Jaycox, Miss Kate Walkie, L. H. Brewster, J. W. Bowen, Dr. and Mrs. H. A. Cross."

Harriet Rosa Edwards writes from Davenport, Iowa: "I find this a very good field for spiritual work. People are willing to learn, but seem to know little of Spiritualism. I have been told there is a population of 40,000, yet there is no society here, and the newspaper men seemed much surprised when I asked to have our meetings inserted under the heading of church notices. However, with one exception (the Democrat) they announced the meetings as requested. Among the more intelligent class it is a pleasure to work, but I had one laughable experience. On going into the parlor to see a lady that called she looked at me quite critically. I invited her into my office, but she said, 'Oh, no! I just wanted to see a Spiritualist. I had never seen one, so called to see how you looked. Well, I was too amused to be angry, so just sat down and laughed, but she was quite serious. I had only intended staying here two weeks, but next Sunday will be our third meeting, and I believe I will stay

The full name and address of every peson who sends an item for this department, must be given, or otherwise it may not appear. Bear that in mind.

Mrs. M. J. Crilly, after a most successful season, has closed her meeting at Allegheny, Pa., to prepare for camp work. She expects to be at Cassadaga camp the entire season.

Dr. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, was at Sherman, Mich, and delivered two addresses, one in the afternoon and one in the evening, May 13. He also gave tests after each meeting.

The annual Indian pow-wow and picnic will be given under the auspices of the Progressive Spiritual Church, G. V. Cordingley, pastor, at Reissig Grove, Riverside, Thursday, June 7, 1900. First pow-wow circle at 11 a. m. Second pow-wow circle at 3 p. m. Conference lecture followed by tests at 4:30 p. m. Camp fire at 10 p. m. All mediums are cordially invited to take part. Dancing in the pavilion both afternoon and evening with no extra charge. A cafe will be on the grounds for those who do not wish to carry lunch. This is a day selected by the Indians for healing and strengthening the body. On this day the weather prophecy for the coming year will be foretold. Directions to the grounds: Take Metropolitan 'L' road, Garfield Park car, to Forty-eighth street, connecting with La Grange electric cars to the gate. In case of rain there is plenty of shelter. Tickets 25 cents. Children 10 cents.

C. Walter Lynn writes from Oakland, Cal.: "Rev. B. Fay Mills is rattling the orthodox bones here. As pastor of the Unitarian church, he has large and intelligent audiences, and delivers eloquent and exceedingly liberal sermons. Of course the flood-gates of abuse are opened up against him by the clergy, for his courage in renouncing their belief, but he says nothing in retaliation, and goes on preaching first-class Spiritualistic sermons to the people. He is doing great good, and it is to be hoped that he will linger long with us. Your paper should be in every home. It teems with good thoughts, and should inspire all to better things and higher motives in life."

L. Hutchinson writes: "In reading over the sayings and doings of the Council of the Presbyterians in St. Louis at this time, it makes me feel as did Sojourner Truth in an anti-slavery meeting before the war, to rise up and ask, 'Is God dead?' or if reason and common sense have fled the earth? I have just re-read that truthful, logical Open Letter in The Progressive Thinker to the reverends and fathers there assembled, to advise and consider if it be wise or best for the interests—not of the race or world at large, but of that particular church which claims to be be advised of the will and decrees of God, that no one not ordained by them have the right to deny or call in question. Like the writer of that Open Letter, I feel it matters not who it is that desires to bear witness to the truth as learned by dearly-bought experience, so much, as the proof that facts not dogmas are set forth and made plain to the human understanding of the true form from the false. The clearing away of the myths of effete theology will be to minds longing for the light of a new day, like that of the carboniferous era was to the earth's atmosphere."

John Penney writes from Wisconsin: "The books came to hand all right, and I am very much pleased with them."

E. H. Morrison writes: "The Pro-Gressive Thinker," long may it wave and flourish, bearing glad tidings of great joy to earth's teeming millions."

Edith E. R. Nickless is in San Diego, Cal., and has some open dates for camp-meetings west of the Rockies.

Mr. C. E. Winans and A. Norman, mediums for materialization and independent slate-writing, are open for engagements in Illinois and Indiana. Address with stamp for reply, Marshalltown, Iowa.

R. T. Leonard, of this city writes: "There will be a Spiritualist christening, Sunday, June 3, at Smith Hall, Wisconsin and Larrabee streets, at 2:30 p. m. German and English speaking by Mrs. W. B. Hilbert and Mr. B. Bernhart."

Dr. Wight writes from Swift Island, N. C.: "A special edition of The Progressive Thinker is needed with a full platform of the United Christian party, with notes on the same so people can see the catchy points."

A cotage woman was speaking to me the other day about the terrible losses of our troops in South Africa. She said: "Eh, but I shouldn't like to live over there when it's all done. The place'll be fair wick wi' ghosts." When I expressed my doubts as to there being such things as ghosts, she said she knew there were, for she "had seen a-many." Pressed further, she said that, at any rate, people who come to a violent end, and especially those who commit suicide, certainly "walk" till "their time comes." By this she meant until such time as they would have died in the course of nature. This limiting of a ghost's time to "walk" is new to me. Is it held at all generally?—London Notes and Queries.

Mrs. S. E. Bromwell had an informal reception and house-warming at her new home 3310½ Rhodes avenue, Tuesday evening, May 22. About 100 were present. There were music, recitations, and refreshments.

Mrs. Chamberlain writes from Marshall, Minn.: "G. W. Kates and wife, our state missionaries, were here the 11th and 13th of May. Mrs. Kates gave very remarkable tests. We had the pleasure of entertaining them, and found them pleasant and congenial guests."

Dr. T. A. Bland and Dr. Cora M. Bland, Rev. H. W. Thomas and Mrs. Thomas, Mr. William Richmond and Cora L. V. Richmond, Mr. C. M. Wellington, Mrs. S. J. Ashton, Mrs. F. C. Cooley, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, Mr. G. Sears, Mrs. Hattie B. Sears, Miss Lena Sears, Mrs. Laura Hahn and Mrs. G. C. Anderson and Master Lee Roy Anderson were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Mullins, at their residence, 746 Adams street, on Monday May 21 in honor of Dr. T. A. Bland's 70th natal day. The table at luncheon was decorated with roses, carnations and ferns, and the menu was a vegetarian feast. Grace was said by Dr. Thomas and Mrs. Richmond. During luncheon soul-inspiring music added to the enjoyment of the guests, performed by Prof. Pfister on violin, accompanied by Mrs. L. Loomis on the organ. After the guests returned to the parlors, a birthday poem was given to Dr. Bland by Ouina, and name poems to Mrs. Thomas and Mr. Sears (the other guests had previously received such), and a poem to all appropriate to the occasion. Congratulations and tributes of appreciation of the Doctor's noble work for justice and right were tendered by all and the Doctor responded in well-chosen words. His spirit friends gave him many loving greetings through Mrs. Mullins and Mrs. Sears. When at five o'clock the guests prepared to leave, all expressed satisfaction in the exercises. The words of appreciation and thanks of Dr. Bland voiced the estimate by all of the royal entertainment provided by the generous host and hostess for both spiritual and physical refreshment. Such feasts of soul enjoyed with those in the life beyond brighten the pathway of mortal struggle.

The Chicago Inter Ocean has the following: "A strange story has just come to light at Minneapolis, Minn., of the queer fancy of a pretty widow who furnished an elegant house complete for the benefit of her dead husband's spirit while she kept her apartments at a fashionable hotel. She has notified the agent that as she is about to marry again she will need the house no longer. She has spent a few moments each day at this strange residence, but has never passed a night beneath its roof. She is a Spiritualist, and this is her story: "We were very much in love. After a few years of perfect happiness my husband died. I was heartbroken. I sold my house and traveled. But I longed to be near my husband's grave, so I came back to Minneapolis and engaged rooms in a hotel. I was just beginning to be comfortable when I became haunted by the thought that my husband's spirit shared the rooms with me. At first this made me very happy until I remembered how he loved air and light and solitude. Then I rented a large, comfortable house with a west front, and had his books and desks moved into it. I visited the house daily. My husband's spirit seemed to invade the place. Then I became haunted by the thought that I was neglecting my husband. I was enjoying luxury and ease, while he was living in a great, cheerless house, without furniture; so I began furnishing the house, choosing for the draperies the bright, warm-looking fabrics that he liked best. I also bought books, rugs, and pictures, but by and by became annoyed by the thought that my husband had become so lonely that he had prevailed upon the spirits of his mother and father, as well as two sisters, one a baby, to live with him. I bought a cradle for the baby sister and easy chairs for the old people. I was about to replenish their wardrobes, although I could hardly afford it, when I met the man who is to be my future husband. He is a practical physician. He questioned me kindly and drew from me the story of my vain attempts to please my husband and his family. It was the first time I had told any one of my dear tenants, and when I finished I was crying like a baby. Gently and carefully my lover physician has turned my attention to the living until at last I have decided to give up the house which I have rented for so long, and instead of mourning for a dead husband to be happy with a living one."

MAN A MODE OF MOTION

Only One Substance in All Nature.

PART II.

Be it as it may as to the doctrine of the transcolation or passage of the human spirit through outward substance, there is the proposition which I submit as being far from an altogether unlikely one, namely, that all things, visible and invisible whatsoever, are but so many modes of motion of one substance. That God and Nature are one in substance and two only in the mode of motion of it (or, if you choose, that God is the substance as motionless, and Nature that substance as in infinite variety of motion), is, I am led to reflect, decidedly more probable than otherwise from certain a priori considerations, many of which, though bearing only negatively upon the subject, are, nevertheless, profoundly suggestive. Nor are these considerations, for the most part, to which I refer, to be met with in the gospel according to Spinoza, Hegel and the rest, so far as I know. It is, of course, but repetition for me to say that, agreeably to this view, man and monad, rock and flower, are the same in substance, and only exist as objects distinguishable by virtue of mode of motion of that substance peculiar in each case. You eat as apples, plums, radishes; but as you, yourself are only a mode of motion with everything else, it is only one mode of motion eating, making summary disposition "to personal ends" of, other modes of motion.

To this proposition it is objected that, from whatever side it is examined, it is little better than Pantheism? I shall not stop to indicate wherein it differs from that, or that it differs at all.

But are there these furious objectors—have they considered the difficulties when the opposite view is taken? Are they prepared to prove the contrary proposition which, quite as much as the other, is an affirmative one, namely, that there are two or more distinct substances in the universe? Suppose we say it is Pantheism; there is not here the bugbear that some people are impatient we should realize; for, I tell you, it is not so much always the doctrine as verbally announced, as how a man is to the doctrine. That is to say, as in other cases, so in this: Pantheism as a thing to be uttered, to be expressed in words, is but a skeleton to be filled in with flesh and nerve, warmth and sunshine, grace and power, inspiration and charm; as there is in the man who thinks it to fill in with these. "What," says someone, "does a man see when he looks? Not what he looks at, but what he looks from." That there are subjects of vast relations and import of an abstruse nature of which no man can supply me with both the warp and the woof of a statement and doctrine as it lays in his own mind; that he can do little more than furnish me with one of these, and that the other will, will be, in spite of myself, chiefly of my own supplying—who is incapable of sensing this is incapable of sensing the first condition of their profitable discussion. And once it is discovered that a party to a controversy touching them fails to recognize momentarily and always this circumstance, it is useless thereafter to have words with him. So, no matter the name by which it goes; here is the thing: First, the oneness of all substance—this object, that object, the other, but so many modes of motion of that one substance; next, which I have not before broached, its atomlessness or unbroken continuity.

And let it be added that, were the considerations bearing upon these propositions derived from deductive reasonings alone, it would be of comparatively little profit to seriously entertain them. But when the probability of their truth thus afforded is reinforced by the suggestive evidence to be remarked with every considerable advance of the inductive sciences, the matter of their reasonableness assumes fresh interest and importance, which only dullness will attempt to gainsay or overlook.

C. K. WHEELER, M. D.

Roxbury, Mass.

DAWN OF A NEW ERA.

Moses Hull Has Optimistic Visions Thereof.

Very soon after coming into Spiritualism I thought and said Spiritualism is the ushering in of a new dispensation; and the Jews never watched more closely for the signs of the advent of their Messiah than I have watched Spiritualism to see signs of its settling down to the business of constructing—doing something beside denouncing others for what they do, or have not done.

The Bible in many places predicts that the dispensation called the Christian dispensation is to be thrown into the shade by the more effulgent glory of a newer era, just as Christianity dimmed Judaism by its more perfect glory. The sun has no fight with the moon and stars, although the latter are hardly noticed when the former shines out in his majesty.

When Spiritualism first began to attract the attention of the world it was iconoclastic; it could be nothing else; the dogmas of the church held the public mind as in an iron grasp. The world went to the church to ask what it might read, hear and think. That day is past; Spiritualism has already done by the thoughts of the world as Jesus commanded his friends to do by Lazarus, that is, "Loose him and let him go." People think the thoughts which commend themselves to their best judgment. No man dare dispute one's right to think, or to speak his thought.

This brings the time to act. These thoughts swept like the oceanic tides over my mind as I listened to an extemporaneous speech from Hon. J. B. Townsend, at the state convention, in Syracuse, N. Y., on the night of May 11.

Though more than twenty days have passed since the deliverance of those utterances, they are as fresh in my mind as if it had not been more than one day. The words were in such entire harmony with my own thoughts that I would like to reproduce their substance here.

First he referred to the iconoclastic spirit which once seemed to have possession of all the workers in Spiritualism, and which even now occasionally manifests itself among some of our veteran workers. He thought this was entirely due to the belligerent spirit manifested by the churches of that day. They returned blow for blow. Some of these veterans still think there is little to do beside carrying on this warfare.

This was illustrated by calling attention to scenes usually enacted in conferences especially when some speaker would allude to prayer, to the churches, or to the Bible, as though it were possible some good could come from such sources.

Spiritualists now coming on the stage of action necessarily have less of this spirit of controversy, speak of these issues as past. Mr. Townsend thought that this apparently irreconcilable difficulty had at last been overcome, and alluded in rather a facetious manner to some of my books as having finally settled these questions, and spoke of having the next national convention adopt my books as having come just in time to end this controversy. Now we could let the dead issues of the past remain in their graves while we go on in our work of upbuilding.

Mr. Townsend said the next "Banquo's Ghost" was politics. To illustrate, when Spiritualists in their papers or from their rostrums declared themselves on any of the political issues, it at once led to wrangle and discord, thus showing that politics in the Spiritualists' camp seldom can lead to anything else than an irreconcilable conflict.

Mr. Townsend thought the thing to do was to put this issue to sleep. The plan for doing this is for Spiritualists to everywhere advance their picket lines into the altruistic field. Thenceforward when asked to explain their attitude as to high or low tariff, sixteen to one, expansion, socialism, etc., they could truly say, "We are beyond all this; we are altruists;" that is we are working for the good of others. We are going to elevate ourselves by working to elevate others. Meantime we could individually cast our votes on these short-lived issues in whatever way the line of least resistance seemed to indicate was most desirable.

The religious and the political questions thus being put to rest, we, the chosen people of the angel world, would inaugurate co-operation by each individually putting our own house in order, by the exercise of the soul in prayer. The muscles of the soul, like those of the body, would by this means expand, and thus become sensitive to spirits not earth-bound, but to those coming from the very peaks of the celestial spheres. Granting that we develop this harmonious condition between the two spheres, and that our soul's desire and purpose is to establish an altruistic state, spirits could then be relied on to quickly institute among men a detailed plan of life which would unmistakably lead to altruism.

The above is but a brief synopsis of a very brief speech—a speech which seemed to fire the audience with an enthusiasm not often seen.

The test of Brother Townsend's judgment is seen in his successes in large undertakings in the practical things of this world. The thoughts given in this convention are the inner thought of the real or spiritual Townsend. The knowledge the public have of his ability in the past, in carrying to success great enterprises, may account for the large number of subscribers coming to his great organization known as King Solomon's Mining Company. In order that this, the crowning effort of Mr. Townsend's life may meet with a success which shall put a higher and grander Spiritualism before the world in the shape of the grandest Altruistic movement the world has ever known, Mr. Townsend has devoted several of the best years of his life to the study of mines and mining as a legitimate industry. If Spiritualists would send to him and obtain his literature they would realize how exceedingly wise and fair he plans his enterprise, and why it has been easy for him to secure the personal endorsement of his worth, character, and ability to manage great enterprises, from the leading men of the nation, including the president of the United States; and from that down to the humblest neighbor he has in his native city, Lima, Ohio. I have spent several months in Lima, and know whereof I affirm.

I have long prayed that some kind of movement for the good of that portion of the world which needs our help might spring up among the Spiritualists, and that it might originate with some one in whom the world has confidence; I believe that prayer seconded by thousands of our best and most altruistic Spiritualists is now about to be answered. At least I shall, for the present, watch with intense interest the movements of this man, who seems to come to the front at the right time.

TEST OF SPIRIT POWER

As Given in the Aber Intellectual Seances.

It is my good fortune to be in triweekly communion with the spirits; a privilege to me more valuable than to be a student of the foremost university in the land; for there I may learn of matters only of this world that will be of small value when I go out of it; and nothing of the world in which I am to spend an eternity.

The whence and the what are revealed to me in these seances. Dwellers of the spirit land come to me in propria persona, and in their independent manner talk with me face to face. Jesus said to his disciples, "Ye now see what the prophets have longed to see, but have not seen;" so now our circle behold grand instructors—men who made themselves eminent while on earth, and have been schooled in spirit life for many years; fully identifying themselves, and giving us the rich fruits of their experience there. What could be more precious than this? They leave their shining abodes and come to earth to lift up and enlighten its inhabitants, and for their sake. In "Pilgrim's Progress" there is a picture of a man with a muck-rake; his head bent to the earth, while he is raking up the dust of the ages. An angel is holding a crown over his head, but he sees it not.

This is the type of the spiritual condition of the earth's inhabitants to-day; and when they enter the spirit world they are lost. The church communicant is looking for Jesus; he cannot find him, and refuses to be comforted; the selfish and sensual devotee finds nothing to satisfy his desires; he who toiled a life-time in the accumulation of wealth, is forced to leave it behind for his heirs to wrangle over; he who has sought for fame or worldly position, finds nothing there to compensate him—all these are in a state of spiritual poverty—a most unfortunate condition. The value, then, of the instruction that can be obtained, is beyond human language to express; beyond the mortal to conceive.

The question—to be, or not to be—which has engaged the attention of mankind for all ages, can be answered here to the satisfaction of anyone who wants to know; but to the opinionated, belief does not result in practice in correspondence with it. Personal opinion and accepted theory are dearer to them than all else; especially when these support their special interests. How few there are who want to know truth for truth's sake! And yet all profess to be in pursuit of the truth.

These remarks are called forth by the facts above stated; namely, the series of seances now taking place in the home of J. H. Pratt, of Spring Hill, Kansas. When I behold these spirit visitants as they come face to face with me, a feeling of reverence and gratitude comes over me, and I realize the opportunities for instruction they afford. In the book, "Rending the Vail," are given the manner of its production and the evidence of that manner. The same manner and the same proof attend the production of the forthcoming book designed as a companion thereto, and in illustration of the teaching contained in it. I find in this work precisely the same manner of production to which I hereby testify. As an example, the following is given in a portion of the seance held on the evening of May 12, as reported by the secretary:

"Wesley who had not been before us for some time, stood at the writing-desk and took up a tablet, opened it and began to write quite deliberately, and while writing he was also talking, saying: 'I think I will write some at this time; for it has been quite a while since I did write, and I believe I can write more concisely than I can talk.

"'I am pleased to meet you in this way. Though unannounced, I have been here at the seances, and I have also been looking around, and I find that Spiritualism is advancing. It is getting strong and vigorous and able to stand on its own bottom. It is moving on, and they cannot stop it. I have now written one page.' He tears the leaf of writing out of the tablet and places it on the desk, and writes on, but talking all the while; continues writing on another page, and while so doing, said: 'They may be able to incarcerate some mediums, but some will be left all the while to carry on the good work.

"'Now sometimes you think we should be here at all times when strangers are here, but we know best. Some cannot comprehend this work; then again, we do not think it best, even if we could, to have too much public gaze into our work until we get it ready for the public.

"'Now, friends, one word to you. We consider you as essential integrants to this work as we, ourselves. Without you, we could no more do the work than you would without us; and we consider you as most extraordinarily faithful souls.'

"As the spirit tears from the tablet his remaining writing, he says: 'I have now written two pages and part of another, and now deliver this to our good friend, Dr. Schellhous, to retain to the close of the seance,' which the Doctor does; and the circle found this to be the writing, to-wit:

"'A great many experiences have been given in these seances by spirits who belonged to orthodox churches while in the physical form, and I feel the explanations they encountered upon passing into spirit life, have not been as clearly stated as they might have been; therefore, I take the liberty of making a few explanations on this matter.

"'Many who came to you say they were in the dark when they entered spirit life. By that they mean that their spiritual sight was undeveloped. The majority of persons belonging to the church think that a belief in the remission of sins is all that is necessary for their salvation. Thus they have depended for years upon some one else to bear the burden of their misdoings, until they have become as helpless as a babe. On the other hand, a small minority whose innate goodness has risen above their creeds, believe that it is necessary for them to assist their fellow-men all that lies in their power, in addition to accepting Christ as their savior. They go forth and help their needy neighbors, and bring comfort to sorrowing hearts by practical deeds. When these latter entered spirit life they, at first expected to find an orthodox heaven, and of course, were disappointed.'"

Here are two hundred and eleven words written while the spirit at the same time of the writing, also spoke in common conversational manner and common rate of utterance, two hundred and thirty-five words; and the matter spoken as widely differs from that written as it is possible to have the difference.

How many people are there in the mortal that can duplicate this feat? Let some wiseacre who knows no word but fraud, try his hand on this experiment. Let him commit to memory both of these efforts—the spoken and the written words, and then try to produce the written words in his own hand-writing, while he will at the ordinary conversational rate, speak the spoken words and report his success to the world, and how he did it, or take down his fraud shingle.

Here are seen at every seance, from fifteen to thirty dwellers in immortal life, in materialized form, ready and anxious to give us light on a subject the most interesting and important that can engage our attention—instruction of infinitely more value than any we can obtain in this world. The loved of long ago joyously greet us and give us information the most needful, and above all, the most desirable. The artist comes and executes the most exquisitely wrought pictures in the incredibly short space of a minute, that would require days of a mortal artist to execute. Only at the last seance, I held one corner of a paper upon which was the life-size picture of a spirit—all done in the time above-mentioned. The spirit artist stood before me as plainly as anyone. On a previous occasion I was favored with a life-size picture of my daughter—a most striking resemblance and skilfully executed.

What more can be asked; what more can be given? The ability to appreciate and respond is lacking. Selfish and sensuous desires blind us to the appreciation of these grand and sublime manifestations; and we grope in spiritual darkness, prizing the things that perish above the imperishable riches of the life beyond.

E. J. SCHELLHOUS, M. D.

Spring Hill, Kans.

Experience of W. H. Burleigh, the Poet.

To gratify a neighbor, I attended a spiritual circle, upon condition that I should not be announced, but permitted to be a silent spectator. I was a stranger to the company present, save the gentleman who accompanied me. I remained a silent spectator of many singular phenomena during the evening, through the mediumship of a young Irish girl in a trance state, apparently in a sleep. Just before the circle broke up, while I was standing in the corner of the room, the medium spoke thus: "Mr. Burleigh, what lady is that standing by your side?" Confused by such a question to me from such a source, I involuntarily looked on either side of me to see if any one was near me. "You cannot see her, but there is one standing by your side, who appears to be closely allied to you—and yet, not by the ties of consanguinity, but those nearer and dearer," said the medium. I asked her to describe her looks, and she did, minutely, as to her height, her style and color of dress, the color of her hair, eyes, etc. Confused and embarrassed, I could think of no one corresponding to her description, when calling for pencil and paper, she wrote upon it: "They tell me thou art dying."

In an instant this key unlocked the whole matter, and bursting into tears, I abruptly left the house, and went weeping home.

Now for the sequel. When a young man of eighteen years I was principal of a select school in my native town in Connecticut, and had a young lady assistant, to whom I was affectionately attached; but being young, and poor, I lovingly and painfully parted from her, went to Pennsylvania and became the editor of a paper, where I remained many years. In the meantime my beloved maiden married one of my old schoolmates and became the mother of several children. In correspondence with my parents and brothers and sisters at home, I always enquired feelingly of the health and happiness of Mary—and was in the habit of hearing from her often. In the year —— I received a letter from my sister, containing the painful intelligence that my dearly cherished and beloved friend, Mary, was dying with that insidious disease, consumption. I was filled with sadness and the deepest sorrow, and under the inspiration of my feelings wrote a short poem, headed: "They tell me thou art dying"—which can be seen at any time by reference to my published volume of poetry. And the person described as my guardian angel, standing by my side, was precisely the person, Mary ——, as she was when my assistant.

A Letter in Cordingley's Behalf.

To the Editor:—In reply to the article published in the last issue of your paper, let me state that the accusation made by the so-called friend is utterly false and without foundation. We have just such friends to deal with every day, who, like dogs in the manger, bark and growl at every new effort put forth for the progress and benefit of any cause. We kindly request this person to investigate a little deeper in this matter. He is entirely mistaken when he states we have camped for several years at Deep Lake, for this will be only our second year. We organized our camping association last year, and we have representative Spiritualists as its officers. The names respectively are, G. V. Cordingley, president; C. M. Fecner, vice-president; H. W. Miller, secretary; Fred Guckenmus, treasurer; Gus Swain, Dr. P. Parker, W. C. Wilke, trustees. We have also a ladies' auxiliary, officially organized, which is doing a mighty work. Besides the main organization we have over one hundred members throughout the state and many more to join later. It is with much regret that we see you allow the green-eyed monster jealousy turn you against one who has always been one of the first to step forward and assist any good, worthy cause. We do not wish to agitate this matter further, but if necessary we can publish in full, names and addresses of those throughout the state who are now members. As to the name of the camp I think we are privileged to use whatever name we choose as long as there is no barbed-wire fence around it and as long as we are not infringing on any one else's right.

Last year several speakers were advertised to be at camp who failed to keep their engagements. Are we to blame for that?

You certainly have not read the paper carefully for we have publicly invited you and others to become members and co-workers with us. Therefore if such is the case that you are privileged to cooperate with it, certainly it is not an individual affair. If you can not accept and help us, please remain dormant and allow those who can and will do so, for in spite of all you do and say against us our camp will live and thrive. A word to the wise is sufficient. Judge not, lest ye be judged.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations, in its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose graves stones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence, "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. F. F. McL., Colorado: Q. I am not in harmony with this world. I am restless. It is difficult to bear the impositions of those that are imposed upon. To perceive the difficulties of substituting intelligence for ignorance—elevation for degradation. This world changes its phases, but the relative status of all seems so nearly maintained. The masses are still incapable of reason or elevated conceptions. Crude and degraded in thought (both the extremes and the middle) I think I shall be glad to go where I can create my own objective world.

A. The mental state of Mr. F. F. McL. is not a healthy one. It is not desirable to stand apart from the world, and upbraid its faults. The great current of life flows by, it maybe rough and turbid, yet there can be no progress made by standing on the shore and condemning the stream as it flows by. The stained and battered crafts which are swept onward even though they drift into side currents and are whirled in eddies, pass by those who grumble on the shore. If we have a more correct perception of truth than the masses, our duty is plain, to do all we possibly can to bring the people to the recognition of reason, and not with cowardice born of pessimism desert our post of duty.

We can make our own objective world now, here in this earthly life, as well as we shall be able to do in the future. Our lines to-day or to-morrow are and will never be all that we may desire, for our ideal is above the real. We should hold ourselves superior to our surroundings, and make our lives independent of others.

We are the result of the accumulation of all the forces which have preceded us in an interminable ancestral line; the culmination of all preceding influences and conditions streaming down to us by heredity. Thus created, or evolved, a creature of circumstances, we become a centerstance, and a creator, center exciting independent force, and are thus able to re-act on our environment. Thus, as a spirit, even though limited by physical conditions, are we able to create our own objective world, and rule supreme therein.

W. F. Shaw: Q. What is the Yogi system of breathing, and its value as a curative agent

A. There has in recent years been a strange attempt to revive the effete systems of the east. The unfamiliar names have served the art of the juggler, and been received as conveying profound thought, whereas a more senseless, misleading, and worthless conception of nature and human life never wasted the attention of mankind. Starting with the false belief that the spirit was bound to the rack of reincarnation, escape from which was almost impossible. The Yoga system pretended to furnish this escape by forms and observances which again united the spirit with the supreme being. As the world was sinful and life despicable, to withdraw the senses from surrounding scenes, crucify the flesh by painful and unnatural postures, and concentration of the mind on some one idea, until it was wholly absorbed and hypnotized into thoughtlessness, were accepted means of gaining that desirable result.

Fasting to the verge of death, disregard of all the necessities of life, were distinguishing marks of the Yogi, who instead of the spiritual teacher who by his asceticism had gained, as he claimed, command of the elements, and of spirits, was a beggar, vile and disgusting in his filthiness.

Great power and influence is claimed by these deluded votaries to come from sitting with eyes steadfastly gazing at the abdomen, and taking deep breaths. Breathing and spirit were confounded by the ancients in their ignorance, and the Yogi are types of the survival of this childish conception of life. These inspirations taken by counts, have no spiritual significance, and no effect more than filling the lungs. Deep breathing is beneficial, expanding the lungs, and thus bringing all the cells into activity.

Frank Totton: Q. (1) Has the N. S. A. any right to influence the railroad people against a regular ordained speaker, to stop his half-fare rates, so as to compel him to join its ranks?

(2) Do you think the spirit world is back of the N. S. A?

(3) Can anyone define God?

A. (1) We are sure that this correspondent is mistaken in his estimate of the N. S. A. The rules adopted by the railroad passenger agents are very strict in regard to clergyman's passes and have from year to year been made more so, the abuses having become insufferable. The society or church ordaining a minister, to have him recognized by the railroad officials, must have standing and send a list of its officers to the proper authorities. Our correspondent is complaining of railroad officials, instead of the N. S. A. I write this without prejudice, for I am not nor have I ever been a member of that organization. The impression, however, has gone abroad, fostered by ill-timed and unwarranted speeches and writings, that such was the aim of the N. S. A., and it is only simple justice that the denial be published.

(2) That there are spirits interested in the N. S. A., there can be no doubt, but to say that the spirit-world is back of it is a very different claim. There are men and women, zealous in its cause, yet we cannot say that the whole mortal world is "back of it."

(3) To define "God" one must be superior to God. Every seven-by-nine preacher, holding forth at the corner school-house, is sure of his ability to do so with mathematical demonstration, and thereby assert his superiority over the God he worships. The highest spiritual intelligences with whom I have ever conversed, profess utter inability to fathom the infinite profundity of the abyss of the universe.

M. L. R., Montreal: Q. Are morganatic marriages contracted at the present time?

A. Morganatic marriage is the union between royal men and women of inferior rank. As the ruler of the least of the insignificant states of Germany was considered of too superior blood to wed the most superior woman of the people, and as such marriages were often desirable on the part of the rulers, they enacted laws to give them a legal coloring and suborned the church to give its sanction as to the morality of such connections. The woman thus wed, and her children had no rank conferred on them, and although not bearing the stigma of illegitimate, they had no inheritance. It is not a marriage, but an illusion, as has been said its name indicates, if as supposed it comes from fata morgana, the tantalizing mirage which appears to the weary traveler over the desert wastes, presenting to his longing eyes, green fields and running waters which as he follows disappear.

Such marriages are yet legal in some countries, and their morality endorsed by the church, but with the advancement of the age are less common, and by the people regarded as a species of concubinage, pernicious and reprehensible.

J. B. B.: Q. When I have sought to obtain through a certain private medium information as to the methods of living of my friends in the spirit world, I have been answered that they are not permitted to tell, "God is not willing for us to tell," though the subjects are such as are freely treated through other mediums. Is there evidence of such restraint or government upon controls, or is it an idiosyncrasy of this particular one?

A. There is no restraint imposed on any spirit except that of their own creation. The spirits of those brought up to believe the superstitions of the church, and that God overlooks everything, and consents or commands, when they reach that existence they presume to be heaven, have this belief intensified and are confident that they are especially deputized by God or his agents, and not allowed to do anything not "permitted." Such an affirmation is sufficient condemnation of the intelligence of those who make it.

Spirits are not "permitted" or "controlled" by God, or any of his agents, any more than man. They are amenable to law, the same as when incarnated in mortal life and subject thereto.

M. W. C.: The lines of evolution seem to make the immortality of animals below man impossible, and the line of demarkation between the perishable and imperishable may cut much farther than is received, into the distinctly human realm. That a spirit exists after the death of the physical form does not prove that it will exist forever.

Mrs. A. E. H.: In the explanation of phenomena the first rule of science is, not refer it to unknown causes until all the known are shown to be inadequate. Thus you may refer the loss of small articles of which you complain to your deficiency in locating and memory, or to the mischievous pranks of some one near you. If these fail, then you may resort to spiritual interference. Many cases on record prove the latter quite possible.

TELEKINESY.

A New Name for Soul Force.

The heading over these lines looks somewhat strange to English eyes, but the notion conveyed by the word is nothing new to Spiritualists. The word is formed on the same principle, as for instance telepathy, telegraphy and so on, from two Greek words, telos—end, and kinesis—motion, and designates the faculty or ability to move inanimate objects at a distance without physical contact I firmly believe that some persons are in possession of this extraordinary gift, and I will cite one instance in support of this belief.

About six years ago I came across a case of inhuman cruelty to a child, a young girl, committed by her own mother. I reported the case to the authorities and through my instrumentality the child was by a decision of the court taken from her mother and placed in a boarding school, supported by the state of Illinois. The rage and fury of the unnatural mother knew of no bounds; in vain did she make every effort within her reach to again get possession of the child, and as time passed on she became more and more embittered against me, whom she looked upon as the most dangerous witness against her. To protect the girl against her mother's intrigues it was at last decided to appoint me her guardian, and just as the legal blanks were filled in and signed, ready to be presented in the probate court, some very strange occurrences took place, which seem to corroborate my idea of telekinesy.

Among many other things in my bedroom, I had a picture of the above-mentioned child, and also the guardianship blank. The picture was standing on a small shelf on the wall, and the blank was lying on a bureau under a big pile of heavy books, on top of which lay several handkerchiefs. Now, I have seen during the course of two months, in full daylight those two inanimate objects, the picture and the blank, picked out from among the many other surrounding trinkets, and after having been shaken, violently thrown down on the floor, to the same place and in the same direction. I have seen this repeated time and again, sometimes when I was alone in the room and sometimes in the presence of other persons. There were also other phenomena of the same nature occurring at the same time and continued for about two months.

I have related those experiences to some of my friends, but none of them has been able to offer a satisfactory explanation. For my part, and until some more plausible interpretation can be found, I believe they were due to a faculty possessed by the child's mother, and which for lack of another name I have chosen to call telekinesy or the ability to move inanimate objects at a distance, and to do so with a certain intelligent purpose. If any of our spiritual friends would tell of similar experiences and also give their explanations I think it would be of value for many searchers after truth, and perhaps open up new vistas into the spiritual realm which to some of us is so near and yet so far. FROM CHILDHOOD TO AGE.

Dear gentle child with the sunny brow,
The canvas is spread and thy vessel's prow
Is turning away from the eastern shore,
Thy ship is to sail life's waters o'er;
The skies are bright and the pearly spray
Is dancing and sparkling along the bay.

I look around on the landscape green,
There are beautiful hills and vales between,
The lambkins are skipping in frolicsome glee,
The birds are building in wall and tree,
Sweet perfumes arise from gardens of thyme,
The bells are swinging in musical chime.

'Tis a lovely land thou art going to leave,
For its innocent joys thou wilt sometimes grieve,
For the emerald glades where the violets sleep,
On the tossing seas thou wilt sometimes weep;
As thy bark shall surge o'er the angry surf
Thou wilt sometimes long for the velvet turf.

Go forth, O my child, and gather the flowers,
Go gather the vines from the woodland bowers,
They will wither, 'tis true, their hues will depart,
But their scent will remain to comfort the heart,
It will whisper to thee of life's morning land,
As thou bearest away to the western strand.

The jewels of wisdom thy mother gave,
Take in memory's casket upon the wave;
Take the mystic girdle of flowing length
To gird up thy loins when thou needest strength
And fold for the voyage thy garments white—
Thou wilt need them to wear in the Isles of Light.

My darling, farewell, time cannot be stayed,
Thy ship is afloat—the anchor is weighed,
The breezes are out and the billows play,
As they bear thee from childhood to age away;
May thy heart be brave and thy hands be strong,
Should the seas be rough and thy journey long.

ROBERT OWEN.

"Until this change in the condition of the human race can be accomplished, it will be impossible for man to be made happy. And this change can be made only by the abandonment of the errors in the principles and practices which have arisen from the supposition that man posseses the power to believe and feel as he likes, and that there is merit or demerit in either belief or feeling, any more than there is merit or demerit in the instincts of any other animal. We are made as they are made, from the elements of nature; we are governed by the laws of these elements as they are governed by them. We are organized or composed, disorganized or decomposed, and reorganized, or recomposed, in like manner as all other animals and material things are composed, decomposed, and recomposed, apparently eternally, without beginning or termination. And for being thus composed, decomposed, or recomposed, with the qualities possessed by or given to each compound, there can be neither merit nor demerit; each must act, of necessity, according to the qualities received by each, and the circumstances which are made to act upon them. But all existences upon earth, with conscious sensation, desire to be happy; and such feeling, it is probable, pervades the universe of life.

"Man, then, desires universally to be happy, and his organization has been made, by some cause or causes, at present undiscovered by him, to require certain conditions to secure the greatest amount of happiness to each individual, and to the race, through succeeding generations.

"These conditions are those which have been described in this part of "The Book," and those which will be explained in the succeeding chapters; but without the attainment of the conditions stated, to-wit: To express the truth only upon all occasions, and to have pure charity for the feelings, thoughts and conduct of all mankind, and a sincere good will for every individual of the human race, the other conditions will forever remain unattainable.

Until circumstances shall arise to form our characters in such a manner that, under every and all circumstances in which we can be placed, we shall have no motive to express, by look, word or action, a falsehood, or anything approaching to it, happiness will be unattainable. Truth, the pure and simple expression of the convictions and feelings which we are compelled to have, by the nature which the operations of nature force us to receive, is alone competent to give us knowledge of ourselves and of humanity; to give us health of body and mind; to produce permanent inward satisfaction; to withdraw all anger, ill-will, jealousies and revenge; to create genuine charity for the thoughts, feelings and conduct of each; and to implant and nourish the feeling of sincere good-will for every individual of the human race.

"It is the unmixed language of truth alone that can create these individual and universal feelings and conduct; and it is a correct knowledge of our own individual nature, of human nature, and of the general laws of nature applicable to man, which can alone create minds with power sufficient to live in a perpetual atmosphere of truth. It is the qualities which simple genuine truth can alone create, that will form in us a knowledge of what is necessary to our happiness, and the moral courage to act uniformly on that knowledge.

"But if human happiness depends upon this character being formed for all individuals, the question arises, 'Can it be formed? Are the means in our power to effect this great good for mankind?'

"It is perhaps the most gratifying of all reflections to know that the science has been discovered by which, without failure or mistake, this character may be ensured to all that shall be born after the science shall have been made familiar to the public and the practice understood.

"Yes, it is true that man may be trained from infancy to know no other language than that of truth; to have no other feelings for all of his race than pure, genuine charity for the thoughts, feelings, and conduct of all, of every clime and color; and to acquire a spirit of good-will and sincere kindness for his fellow-man, in whatever quarter or district of the world he may be found. This is the spirit which can alone ensure peace upon earth, make man a rational being, and secure him prosperity and happiness.

"But the character of truth, charity, and kindness, has never yet been formed for man; it is not now known in any part of the earth. The priesthood of the world have prevented its formation, and they have made it unavoidable that the opposite character—that of falsehood, uncharitableness and unkindness— should universally prevail, as it does at present over the whole earth. The priesthood and the world will now soon become conscious of the great error which has been committed and the evil of continuing it. They will now discover that they are all individually most severe sufferers in consequence, and they will become ready to effect the change for their own benefit and for the permanent advantage of their children and descendants.* It is a law of human nature that man desires to be happy; as soon, therefore, as the priesthood of the world shall be enabled to understand how much their profession is destructive of their own happiness, of that of their children, as well of the whole population of the world, they will abandon it, as being productive only of imbecility in some, arrogant presumption and violent passions in others, and error, falsehood, and uncharitableness, in all; besides being a total stop to the improvement and happiness of the human race. And certain it is, that until the character of truth, charity and kindness can be made the universal character of man, full and complete happiness cannot be experienced by any; for the knowledge that any of our fellow-creatures are inferior or less perfect than they can be made of man, will prevent the full enjoyment of the happiness of men made to become rational beings."
—Robert Owen.

*Note.—The venerable philanthropist, then past the three score mark, must have had a higher opinion of the priesthood, than can be entertained of them, at the close of the 19th century, or he would not be so hopeful of the future of the race. How great must be his disappointment! C. H. MATHEWS.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. DEATH DEFEATED,

—OR—

The Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young,

BY J. M. PEEBLES, M. D., M. A., Ph. D.

It certainly is just what is needed as a bpok of good suggestions and instructions along the line of health. He treats the subject in his own matter-of-fact style. The book comprises a practical subject handled in a practical manner by a practical man. Even if people do not wish or expect to live here always, they should know how to live right and enjoy the life that belongs to them. This is undoubtedly the most useful book for the masses the Doctor has ever published, for it strikes at the root or cause of disease, and tells how to avoid it. 212 pages, cloth bound. Price, $1. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, And All Being.

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

WONDERFUL CURES.

The sick are beginning to find out that are those who can cure. For 25 years Dr. Watkins has been blessed with the most wonderful Psychic Gift, and the sick and poor are begirding to feel that in DR. G. E. WATKINS they have not only a competent physician but a most wonderful Psychic, and a friend who watches their case, and cares for them with the same carefulness as their old home physician. A physician should be a friend. Some so-called Healers send medicine and that is all the interest they take in their patients. Dr. Watkins writes weekly letters of advice, and expects his patients to report once a week.

PSYCHIC HEALING

is a fact that is demonstrated by the wonderful cures that we make through this wonderful gift. If you are quite sure that your present physician does not understand your case write us to-day, sending age, sex and leading symptom and we will diagnose your case and send the same by return mail. It will not cost ONE CENT. Then if you are not blessed with much wealth, write us and we will make price of treatment right

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

Lock Box 1421, Denver, Colo.

TRUTH

The only way to find out who is the "Greatest Psychic Physician living" is to read what their patients say.

DR. G. E. WATKINS

never claims that he is the greatest physician living, or that he is the

GREATEST PSYCHIC.

He believes that there are hundreds of healers who are just as successful as he is, and he never yet has claimed that he is or was the best psychic, although twenty years before the public as the independent slate-writer with the record of not one person who ever accused him of fraud, ought to make the public THINK when they compare his claims to other so-called psychics.

DR. G. E. WATKINS

only desires those who are sick to remember that for over twenty years he has been before the public as a psychic, and over twelve years as a physician, and he never claims greater powers than others; but we believe he has a right to think he has as great gifts as those who claim so much.

Kindly read the following

TESTIMONIALS:

A. K. Skeels, 890 Venison avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, writes: "Must say your diagnosis is a wonderfully accurate delineation of my condition. Judging from my own feelings I could not give a fuller detailed account of facts regarding my physical condition than you have given. In this you have inspired confidence in your ability to heal the sick. Thanking you most sincerely for your kind efforts in my behalf."

MEDIUMSHIP.

Some Pointed Remarks on Its Status.

The structure of Spiritualism is founded upon mediumship. By mediumship we mean the experiments with the philosophy of receiving individual thought and force from the disembodied spirits and utilizing this power by projecting into the atmosphere to be absorbed and applied to the needs of mortals according to the capacity and demand.

Whether received as an individual love message, or a scientific and philosophical treatise; a word of practical advice or a hint on health; an indirect manifestation of power upon inanimate objects, or a panorama of clairvoyant pictures; a dream of the future, or a vision of visiting angelic loved ones, it is simply mediumship.

He that submits to spirit power for the benefit of mankind, is at once blessed and burdened with an incomprehensible responsibility.

He is among the angels, and also dwells with the lowest of earth.

He stands bewildered in the city of possibilities. Avenues are open upon every hand that lead to the Temple of Knowledge; yet he is besieged upon every corner by vampires and medium-killers, that hail from the ranks of Spiritualist workers as well as from the skeptical class.

He is guided up the steep winding stairs to the inspirational temple of the Gods; and the next moment is hurled to the ground and overcome by an indescribable combination of gross conditions.

The public medium that is a willing subject for minds to act upon, is of all men to be pitied, protected and upheld in his struggle between the two worlds.

In the earlier days of Spiritualism the feelings and opinions of the medium were respected, and the conditions required by the spirits to manifest by trance speaking or any phase were complied with; rules and regulations governing the operations were strictly enforced. People appreciated that which they received, and the result was grand.

It is a lamentable fact that mediumship is apparently on the decline, and the presentation of the phenomena is not, as a whole, satisfactory to either intelligent people or spirits.

Why are these things thus? Who is to blame? Is it all the fault of public mediums, or are the people of which the audience is composed, and also the public speakers and writers responsible for much of the deplorable state of affairs which confronts us?

Allow me to suggest that much is owing to the lingering appetite for the miraculous and marvelous, that has been given the people in the many bibles of the world. The masses of the Spiritualists have not yet outgrown the effect of the impossible in the form of stories about Jonah and the whale, the snake and apple business, and the devils chasing the hogs into the sea.

It is hard to give up the brass serpents, the arks, and the quail stories and Moses' mountain seances. The wonderful and startling still attracts the people.

The credulity of man is as injurious as his stubborn skepticism.

"Come, let us reason together," might well be adopted by all attendants of seances.

The dogmatic Presbyterian becomes a bigoted Spiritualist, using no more reason than he did when in his church. His material interpretation of heaven with its gates of pearl and streets of gold and flowery beds, and his hell with its bake-oven and foundry furnace, crops out in his unreasonable demand for the impossible physical manifestations. He clings tenaciously to his material spirit land until after floundering around a few years he is constrained to be reincarnated and get his full of the material. Some grow so credulous that the alert trickster with an eye for the money there is in it, palms off "any old thing" for a spirit; and woe unto him who endeavors to teach the "investigator" anything of the philosophy. Our friend has no time for philosophical explanation.

"Physical phenomena he wants, and the physical, minus the phenomena, he gets. In vain the refined and intellectual medium strives to lift the masses out of the coarser grades of thought; it is impossible.

Then there is another side to the question; a most dangerous atmosphere bearing the stubborn self-opinionated thought vibrations to the sensitive medium, from a large number of speakers and writers in our ranks and crushing out good true mediumship.

Some of these are not, and never were mediums enough to comprehend the complicating conditions that govern mediumship.

They sneer at that most beautiful and only convincing phase, the "trance," and flippantly speak of the trance speaker as "that shut-eyed talker," etc. We frequently hear these people boast of not being "obliged to be controlled;" they do not allow any spirit to control them, etc. The fact that many spirits do not control their mediums quite as well as others speak with no seeming control is no argument against trance mediumship, but rather for it. What is mediumship for, if not to prove that an outside intelligence does exist, and can demonstrate the continuity of life?

Again! What is Spiritualism for, if not to distinguish itself by spirit action upon mortals?

To those who have devoted their lives to the study of receiving information from the spirit world and the application of this knowledge to every-day life, it seems almost like a farce, to witness at camp-meetings and conventions the disregard for the necessary conditions by which spirit communications must be produced.

It is absolutely impossible for a genuine medium to do themselves or the noble cause of spirit return justice, after two and a half hours of speech-making and other exercises have been carried out, and, strange to say, the lecturer will tell the audience of the wondearful possibilities of spirit manifestation, what he and others have seen, etc., but in nearly every instance he himself does not know what it is to either see, hear or sense a spirit. Yet he and the expectant audience await the appearance of the medium at the end of the philosophical (?) speech, who must press a button and without any hesitation produce an army of spirits, with full forms, full names, accurate descriptions, for 15 minutes—no longer—without a single mistake—all recognized, of course. Great applause follows and the curtain drops.

Don't we know that this demand for the marvelous and wonderful furnishes a supply, and who is to blame?

Cease the suicidal custom of forcing mediums.

Check the ambitious desire to get a crowd and to fill the treasury of the stock company. Aspire for spirituality. "For spiritual things must be spiritually discerned."

Ask for the elevating and intellectual demonstrations; apply and utilize the mass of evidence we have already obtained; weave our spiritual experiences into our every-day lives, and thus become nobler, grander men and women, and the supply will adjust itself to the demand.

Let stability of character and loftiness of purpose, and high aspirations govern all seances and public demonstrations.

Cease making either a god or a devil out of a medium; neither require him to be a real estate agent or a lawyer; a mine locator or a lover finder; but rather a true instrument for the reception of the highest and purest of spiritual wisdom. GEO F. PERKINS.

BOOK REVIEWS.

'Lisbeth. A Story of Two Worlds. By Carrie E. S. Twing. In interest and power this volume by Mrs. Twing is worthy a niche alongside of Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

It is a hard book to lay aside after one has commenced reading it. From the first line until the finis, the reader's interest is enchained, while the talented author veers aptly "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" bringing forth lessons illustrative of varied phases of human nature; of cold-blooded religious tyranny in the name of Christ; of loving kindness under an exterior of vivacity and mirth; of the spirit that would crush and mangle human hearts "In His Name"; and of the pure humanities, the purely human spirit of goodness that is good without what is called religion.

Tender scenes of touching pathos there are, that will fill the readers eyes with moisture; and in contrast with these are scenes of brutal harshness, the outcome of false and cruel religious teachings.

The whole story bears within itself in all its parts and instances, a fixed impress of reality—it reads like a veritable narration of facts of actual human experience.

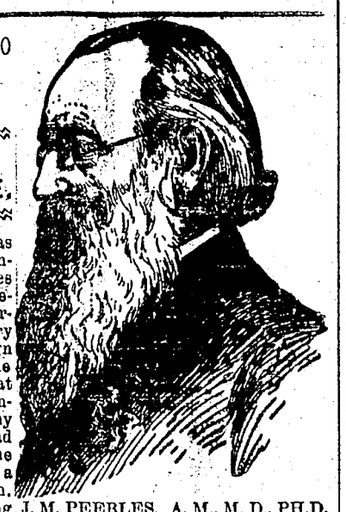
The volume is sweetly and thoroughly imbued with the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism, which is instructively placed in sharp contrast with the doctrines and results of a relentless creed.

No Spiritualist will regret having purchased this book, and if our people only knew its value and exceedingly interesting character, the book will surely "go off like hot cakes." It is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Neatly bound in cloth, $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1. For sale at this office.

"Three Jubilee Lectures." By J. M. Peebles, M. D. Doctor Peebles is a trenchant and instructive writer and lecturer, and these three addresses on the occasion of and pertinent to the Jubilee of Modern Spiritualism, are well worthy of being preserved in this tasty form, in print. Price, 35 cents. For sale at this office.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Spiritualists who love deep, clear thought, reverent for truth alone, will be pleased with it, and well repaid by its perucal. For sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.



"The Commandments Analyzed." By W. H. Bach. The Commandments are not only analyzed, but contrasted with other Bible passages, showing great incongruities. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"The Priest, the Woman and the Confessional." This book, by the well known Father Chiniqui, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of the Romish confessional, as proved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

"The Spiritualism of Nature." By Prof. W. M. Lockwood. Price 15 cents. For sale at this office.

A TRUE HEALER

He Brings Health and Strength to Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

SCIENCE TRIUMPHS OVER DISEASE.

DR. PEEBLES, noted the world over as a physician and scientist, is performing some of the most remarkable cures the world has ever seen. His fame has become world-wide on account of these marvelous cures. He has patients in every state in the Union and in many foreign lands who stand ready to testify to the wonderful cures he has made of cases that had been treated by many of the most eminent physicians without success. Many of the Doctor's patients are those who had traveled all over the world, visiting all the great health resorts and sanitariums in a Futile Search for Health and strength. They returned home in despair, thinking there was no hope for them, when they were persuaded to write to Dr. Peebles for a diagnosis. This was so clear and complete, showing a thorough understanding of the case that it inspired enough hope to induce them to try, as a last resort, a course of his treatment. Many such cases show wonderful improvement from the start. A very few months is sufficient in almost all cases to complete a perfect cure. Mrs. L. A. Humbel, of Long Pine, Neb., who was given up with dropsy and kidney disease by the best physicians in the country says: "I am very grateful for what you have done for me, as I am in better health than I have been for five years. I have gained fifteen pounds, and I am getting stronger every day. Last month I visited my aged mother in Iowa. She was greatly rejoiced for she never expected to see me alive again. For five years I travelled and doctored with the best physicians, finally gave up in despair, and went home to my sister, as I thought to die. I can never express how thankful I am for what you have done for me."

Remember that Dr. Peebles does not cure by Christian Science, Mesmerism, or any other "ism," but employs mild but potent remedies in connection with his wonderful Psychic Treatment. These Psychic Treatments, say his patients, "seem as a breath of higher life." If you do not fully understand the Psychic Science and these Psychic Treatments which are such a wonderful aid in the treatment of chronic and obscure cases, the Doctor will send you his essay, "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease," which will explain to you fully Psychic Diagnosing and Psychic Treatment with other valuable information for the sick. There is no one so capable of writing on this subject as Dr. Peebles, for he has investigated it for over a half century, and is a recognized authority on the various occult sciences in Europe as well as in this country.

All of Dr. Peebles' diagnosing is done by the aid of his psychic gifts. He can read the diseased conditions of the body as accurately as if each organ and tissue were open to his view. Out of many thousands of cases he has diagnosed during the past few years, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of each thousand are willing to testify to the marvelous accuracy of the diagnosis. Do you know your exact condition? Have you suffered for years without getting permanent help? Did the physician who treated you fully understand your case? Why will you be experimented upon by those who do not really understand your case when Dr. Peebles can diagnose your case perfectly and thus administer treatment upon a scientific basis? Why will you take patent medicines which are prepared for a "text-book" case, and which at best give only Temporary Relief, when you can secure treatment from this EMINENT HEALER that is Especially Prescribed and Suited to your case, at a very little more cost! These are the questions that interest all those suffering from chronic and obscure troubles. Think them over carefully. If you are sick and discouraged don't delay one moment in writing the Doctor for a diagnosis of your case. There is nothing of more importance to you than the condition of your health. It will cost you nothing to learn this. The Doctor will send FREE OF COST a complete diagnosis of your case, and also his essay "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease" and valuable literature on chronic diseases and testimonials from some of his cured patients, showing the long list of so-called incurable cases which he has cured. No disease is really incurable if perfectly understood. Every effect or diseased condition has its cause and if these are understood they can in almost every case be removed. When this is done permanent recovery is the result. DO NOT DESPAIR if you have failed to get permanent help, but write at once. Remember that DR. PEEBLES HAS CURED HUNDREDS WHERE ALL OTHERS HAD FAILED. Write him an honest letter, giving full name, age, sex and leading symptom in your own handwriting and he will give you a complete and full diagnosis and will also send the literature as mentioned above. Write today.

Send name, age, sex, complexion and ten cents in stamps, and receive a correct diagnosis of your case free, worth dollars to you. Address,

FRANCES L. LOUCKS,
Lock Box 7, Stoneham, Mass.

Dear Readers:—Did you ever think that the reason why so many sick people cannot get help is because their case is not understood by their physician? so, of course, he cannot give them a remedy that will pass to the afflicted parts and open the natural passages for disease to be cast out. So physician and patient are working under a disadvantage. Why not write to a good Clairvoyant and find out just what and where your disease is located? That ought to give you confidence to let them prescribe for you, then you will enjoy good health. Just read what some of the happy ones say:

Mrs. F. Loucks—Dear Madam:—I desire to offer you my grateful testimony to the good that your treatment has done me. I was very much reduced by Nervous Prostration about two years ago and my restoration was magical, from complete prostration to strength and energy, within three days after taking your remedies. Since then I have had two attacks of stomach trouble, which also yielded to the remedies immediately. Your diagnosis was perfect being correct in every particular. Yours sincerely,
Ayer, Mass., March 15, 1899. MYRA McLEAN.

My dear Mrs. Loucks:—I suppose by this time you would like to hear from me. Your medicine is doing its work surely and wonderfully. I feel better than I have for three years. You would be surprised if you could see me now and when I began my treatment. Send me some of your circulars to give to my friends. May the angels bless and keep you is my wish. MRS. H. A. TRASH.

TWO IN ONE,

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a candid comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

ASTRAL WORSHIP.

By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton.

MAN

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF

Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind. From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contributions which, during our short personal existence, we furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

The Soul of Things;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. STRONG REASONS FOR VEGETARIANISM Moral, Physiological, and Psychological Objections to Flesh-Eating.

For a number of years I have determined to give the public some of my reasons for being a Vegetarian, but though I had only intended to write briefly on the subject, I have always had some more pressing matter to look after. I believe it is my duty and the duty of others to inform the public of our reasons for abstaining from a flesh diet; because there can be no question that when those reasons have been stated, numerous others will become vegetarians, also; for absolutely there is not one sound reason for flesh eating—not one, while the arguments for abstaining from flesh-eating are insurmountable. I am fully aware that positive statements like this sound dogmatic and are deemed absurd, especially by a prejudiced class of people, who do many things, not knowing why they do them, except they grew up under that routine, and everybody else does the same thing. I can't help it; honest inquirers after truth will not allow a positive statement to prejudice them, and dishonest ones are beyond our reach.

The ignorance of the public on this subject is lamentable, as well as embarrassing to a vegetarian, whose finer senses are continually shocked by the appearance of flesh on every table; and still worse it is offered or passed to him, as if its presence on the table was not punishment sufficient for his eccentricity. Please understand, I am not blaming any one for this. It is the custom of the world, and no one sees anything either shocking or disgusting in it. I did not myself, until my eyes had been opened, and then it was several years before I came to the loathing I have for flesh, and the horror I have for murdering animals for food. People often banter and joke me on the subject. They have no idea how serious the matter is to me and other vegetarians, or they would not offer their playful remarks.

My first objection to flesh eating is that it is morally wrong. I am aware that the ordinary flesh eater never thinks upon the ethical phase of the question. If you refuse meat when it is presented to you, he will generally inform you that meat never hurts him, or something of that nature, just as if everything must be considered from a selfish standpoint. The love of life in the lower animals is never considered, nor does the moral effect on one's character trouble his mind. There is a question among Spiritualists, whether animals live after the demise of their bodies. I will not discuss it here. In either case I could not afford to destroy their present lives for my selfish gratification. Their present lives, for aught I know, are worth as much to them as mine is to me, and if they really have another life, they are my fellow creatures in all respects except intelligence, a gift that came to man by the advantage of his two hands and flexible palate and tongue. Probably I should be ashamed to meet in another life the brute I had eaten or killed, if chance should throw him across my path, on account of what he might think of me for what I had done; and I certainly would not like the reflection coming back to me that I killed that animal in earth-life. On the other hand, if there is no after life for the brute kingdom, they have a right to all of this life. I have no right to rob them of the only life they have. This is the first phase of the question that is presented to me. People often say, when flesh is refused, "Well, I don't think meat hurts me; if I did I would quit it," as if that was the only desideratum, as if we were actuated by no other than a selfish motive, as if one had never seen a poor calf going to its death, bleating piteously in the streets, or a crazy steer becoming desperate as he senses by some sort of psychometric power which seems to be a gift of some animals, that he is being driven to his death. While I believe no one should eat of anything which injures them (and I will show later that flesh eating is pernicious to both health and morals), I have a stronger motive for eschewing meat. I question my right to murder and devour animals.

In 1859, I shot off the under jaw of a squirrel which was carrying a walnut in his mouth, the ball dropping a little from his head, which I aimed at. I shall never forget the pitiful cries of that poor creature as he moved to a limb of the tree and sat on it. The next shot I killed him, after which I went home, and never since that time have I shot at a creature of any kind. Such a lesson was needed by me.

2. My second argument is, that the structure of the jaws and teeth show that man is not a carnivorous animal. His jaws move laterally, instead of perpendicularly as in the carnivora, showing that in the process of mastication nature intended he should grind his food, but flesh never should be ground. The carnivorous animals always chop their food.

3. All animals are subject to disease, and we can't always tell when an animal is in a poor state of health. Often a great many persons are taken violently sick with the same symptoms, simultaneously in a village or city. All the physicians are called out. There is one thing a physician never does—that is to confess his ignorance of the name or nature of any case he is called to diagnose and prescribe for. He can't hold his patronage and be honest with his patrons, and he knows it. He is not really to blame, since the ignorance of the public forces him to take this line of action. The fact is, the public pays a premium on hypocrisy and charlatanism, and an honest physician cannot succeed. He looks wise when called to the bedside of the family, nearly all of whom are sick, gives the disease a name and prescribes a placebo—that is an assumed remedy—probably bread pills, or writes a prescription of p. bark and chlo.-sodium ss gr. iij. aqua oz iv. M: teaspoonful every 30 min., and goes home to study his books, from which he derives no information. The trouble is the butcher killed a diseased beef, probably an angry steer. Anger is insanity, and insanity is always a disease. In all cases of anger the blood is poisoned, and as the blood goes to all parts of the system the entire system is poisoned and unfit for food. A mother may poison her babe by allowing it to nurse while she is in a passion of anger.

As remarked a little while ago, all animals are liable to disease and it is difficult to tell when an animal is entirely clear of disease. At least nine out of every ten hogs slaughtered for food are unhealthy, and the healthiest hogs, on account of their uncleanness, are entirely unfit for food, or even for soapgrease. Ruminants of all kinds are healthier, and more cleanly, but how are we to be assured of their perfect health?

4. All flesh is necessarily nasty, and unfit to eat. Every moment of the life of every living animal there is a process of elimination of excrementitious matter. This matter is on its way to the exterior of the animal, and the moment the blood ceases to circulate that matter is arrested in its movement to the surface. This matter is of a mucus nature, the same as one spits up from the lungs, or rubs from beneath the surface of the skin when bathing. Having served its purpose as living tissue, it died and was being moved to the surface to be dumped overboard as it could not be retained within the system without danger to health. But this cadaver, thus arrested in its deportation, is served to us in our "juicy steaks." How any one can in the contemplation of this fact ever eat another piece of meat is more than I can comprehend.

5. Now we come to a very strong objection to flesh eating. It is a psychological objection. I do not believe people are assimilated by what they eat; if I did I should certainly favor putting some of our trust magnates on a pork diet till they became as good as the hog they eat; nor can persons always assimilate what they eat. But the meat people eat must naturally have a malignant effect upon the more sensitive of our people. We are all conversant with the fact that a psychometrist will take up a fragment of a rock, and if a murder had been committed near the locality where the rock is found will get from the vibrations around it, a history of the tragedy. A piece of wood from the gallows where a man had been hung was once displayed at a camp-meeting where I was, but none of the mediums present could endure to retain it in their hands. But here is a calf hauled in a wagon trembling in every joint and bleating piteously as it somehow senses that it is about to be slaughtered to satisfy the depraved appetites of humanity. It is taken to the slaughter-house and smells the blood of other victims that had preceded it, and the sharp knife is placed to its throat, and the meat divided up among the customers and every sensitive in the village assists in eating it. Is it any wonder that we have so many nervous diseases in the country, and that a greater proportion of them are in our towns and cities? Isn't it a wonder that the lists of our insane are not augmented from the circumstance of eating murdered creatures?

6. It is well known that the killing of animals blunts all the higher senses and finer feelings. Butchers are from the nature of their business coarse people. A lawyer in defence of a murder trial can object a butcher off the jury merely because he is a butcher. If butchering makes a man less sympathetic, and unfits him for dispassionate weighing of evidence in cases where the life of a prisoner is at stake, should we indulge a habit that makes such a business necessary? It may have been a coincidence that two sausage-makers in Chicago boiled their wives to pieces, but as each individual's character is shaped somewhat by his occupation, we should expect to find a greater percentage of murderers among animal slayers than any other class. In this estimate, to be fair, we should include wanton murderers of innocent animals and birds.

7. But the worst effect is that which it has upon the mothers of our country. A majority of the mothers of this country are the cooks in their respective families, and are required to cut up the meat in sections convenient for cooking, to dress and sometimes even kill fowls. Even though these mothers are not in process of maternity they may be throwing this condition on the next conception. The result may be a murderer is brought into the world.

At the age of 14 years Jesse Pomeroy murdered several of his playmates in the South Boston bottoms, cutting them to pieces and mutilating them in numerous ways. It was eventually discovered that he was the murderer, and he was sentenced at that young age to hang. The interest I took in the matter of a commutation of his sentence resulted in an acquaintance with his mother, who was a highly esteemed and a well respected lady of that city. But how came this boy, this son of kind-hearted parents to be a wanton murderer. He was made so by the conditions surrounding his mother previous to his birth. Mr. Pomeroy, the father of the boy, was a grocer in that part of Boston, where he lived, and as is customary in that city among grocers, sold meat. Occasionally when out of his store making deliveries of goods, Mrs. Pomeroy would be required to attend on customers, and one of her duties would be to cut off steaks for those requiring them. Under these conditions the boy was born, and that psychological mark, for which all meat-eating customers of Mr. Pomeroy were innocently responsible, was placed upon him, and the State of Massachusetts is now punishing him, for what the gastronomic habits of the people have made him.

Even our darling daughters are required to cut up meat, and often even sent to the butcher shop, where they are permitted to look on while the butcher cuts off a steak, or saws up a bone. Sometime she will become a mother in her own family. It may be many years after when in the most fatal time possible the whole matter may be spread out and possibly exaggerated in a dream. The fatal work is done, the expected child has been marked for a murderer. I am led to this from the fact that I used to kill or assist in killing animals for family use. For years afterward and until I reformed my diet, I occasionally had dreams of killing a mutton or a beef, which in my dreams as I was dressing it became metamorphosed into a human which I was dressing with the purpose of eating it. Having had such dreams myself, I assume that others are likely to have the same kind, and among these may be some mothers whose dreams may be opportune for very bad results.

These are some of my strong objections to a flesh diet. I have other arguments, but in the light of what has been presented I deem them unnecessary. Of all the people in the world I believe Spiritualists should be the first in dietetic reform. D. W. HULL.

POEM.

Given by Ouina, through the lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, at the birthday party tendered to Dr. T. A. Bland, by Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Mullins.

I should like to give you all a birthday greeting,
Or something like a token that would last;
That in the hours of these, each joyous meeting,
May all along the way some brightness cast.
It is a birthday always when you meet in love;
There are no years in the realm above.

But we are born such time as hope and prayer
And prophecy have their fulfillment here;
Such time as love comes to us unaware
And opens the blest path of the heavenly sphere;
Born unto the highest kingdom of life each day,
Such time as another shadow is cast away.

If we forget the pain and care and strife;
If we outgrow one imperfection here
That is a birthday, a new dawn of life,
Something that opens to the heavenly sphere.

So every weakness that we cast aside—
As we do all the playthings of childishness—
Any of the things of outward gain or pride,
Or whatsoever will upon the spirit press,
Or encompass the way, entangling the feet,
When we the new light and glory meet.

Then on this birthday let us all rejoice
That we clasp hands unto the common good,
That we believe in the one enduring voice,
In the crown of love, the voice of humanhood.

That this is our possession day by day;
At last when life pass, as it must here
On the earth, and we find the better way
Is opened, and we fulfill the duties near,
Lo! there is another, the supremest good.
May we clasp hands that day in angelhood.

MEMORIAL SONG.

For many years the May-time flowers
Have kissed the unforgotten grave
Of the soldier true who wore the blue,
And died to free the slave.
While just beside, impartial hands
Reach down and clear the weeds away
And spread bright flowers on the grave
Of him who wore the gray.

Chorus:—
We'll scatter flowers o'er the grassy graves
Of those who gave their lives to free the slaves,
And then as gladly weave the garlands
Of flowers just as bright,
The graves to brighten and hearts to lighten,
Of those who thought their cause was right.

This mingling of their sacred dust
In memory's flower-scented urn
Has caused the patriotic fires
In every heart to burn,
Until from valley, hill and plain,
From North to South, from shore to shore,
Goes up in one tremendous strain.
"Union forevermore!"

Each year we find fresh heaps of dirt
Which means—ah, what! but well we know,
As we stand and think how new they look,
By the sunken ones and low.
And then we think of new-made graves
Away in foreign, hostile lands
Which no fair flowers will decorate
Arranged by gentle hands.

And then there comes another thought
To us upon this holy day,
As we behold the thinning ranks
Of the veterans old and gray.
'Tis this, that while they yet remain,
Our wreaths about them should be found,
That we not wait until they're dead,
And strew them on the ground.

THERE IS NO DEATH.

Continuity of Life Demonstrated.

In all ages, and all countries of the world, among all conditions and classes of people, a belief has been very prevalent that another life is in store for human beings, after casting off the tenement of clay and becoming free from earth's environments. It is probable that no race of people ever existed who were too low in the scale of progression as to be entirely devoid of hope in the possibility of living in some form or other after the change called death. But something in human nature has always demanded a proof of such a life, and a glimpse of the unseen world to satisfy them of there being such a life and such a world. This something has come from the spiritual nature of men and women which ever seeks to overcome the material. It is the inner divine consciousness asking for truth, asking for light and knowledge upon this all important question.

Unfortunately the great mass of the human family are so engrossed in the material wants and cares of their earthly existence that they allow their material desires to have the supremacy over the spiritual, their spiritual natures are allowed to starve for want of spiritual truth and knowledge, and yet there is in every person—no matter how indifferent they may appear to be, a divine spark from the great infinite soul of the universe, which some time or other will try to make itself felt in the individual's life. That divine spark is an unquenchable fire, a spark from the eternal creative life forces of the universe and will make itself felt to every person sooner or later. It may lie dormant for years, it may seem to be almost crushed out by material prosperity and the grosser needs of the physical body, but some time or other when a dear relative or friend passes out of that individual's life, then that spark will make itself felt and demand recognition. Then when the loss of that relative or friend is keenly felt, the spiritual nature will demand food of a spiritual kind. The questions which will arise and demand an explanation are such as these: "Where is my friend? Is the grave the final end and goal of all human aspirations, hope and labor? Are we all simply perishable material manifestations which come upon the scene of action, the earth life, and then after awhile drop into oblivion? Is there another world, a spiritual world; another life, a spiritual life; another body, a spiritual body?" Where shall we go to have these questions answered? Is there any way by which the misty veil of the future can be at least partially torn aside and our eyes, ears and other organs of sense satisfied of future life. To all these questions the answer comes, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." But how are we going to prove? The answer comes, "By the development of our spiritual natures." Take the advice of St. Paul to the Corinthians, "Cultivate charity and desire spiritual gifts." In other words have charity in your souls for those who have thoroughly investigated this matter. Then do as they have done, cultivate your spiritual powers, investigate spiritual manifestations, read up and educate yourself in the spiritual philosophy.

Give your loving friends upon the spirit side of life a chance to return to you. By refusing to investigate spirit manifestations and by neglecting to cultivate your spiritual powers you shut the door and refuse to admit those who desire to show their continued love for you, and who are trying to prove to you that they still live and take an interest in your welfare.

If you were to go to a strange city and you had friends in that city that you wished to communicate with, but they refused to answer your knock at their door how would you feel? How must our spirit friends feel when they come to our homes and lovingly try to impress us in some way with their presence and we turn a deaf ear to them. We refuse to listen to their knocks for admission by ignoring mediumship, by ignoring family circles for investigation.

A properly conducted family circle is the most sacred as well as the most pleasing institution on earth. There broken families can be re-united, the spirit members uniting with those who are still in the flesh.

There love is shown to be continuous as well as life, and the door of communication between the two worlds kept regularly open. But someone will ask, How can we open this door? By what means can we be made conscious of our loved one's presence? The answer comes, "By the development of the spiritual faculties the same as we are made cognizant of the presence of material things by the organs of physical sense. Spirit communication with mortal can be demonstrated in so many ways, and new phases of mediumship are constantly showing forth, therefore it is impossible to clearly enumerate all. But a few of the principal phases of mediumship will be explained briefly. Mediumship or the development of powers for spiritual communication consists of two distinct classes termed mental mediumship and physical mediumship. The principal mental phases are those of clairvoyance, a power of clear seeing by which the presence of spirit friends is made known, and by which descriptions may be given of such friends. Then comes clairaudience or clear hearing, a power which enables the possessor to catch sounds of names and messages from the unseen visitors. But these powers in different persons assume different forms and can only be explained by those possessing them, and sometimes it is a matter of extreme difficulty for mediums themselves to make themselves or their phase of mediumship understood. Then there are the phases of inspirational speaking, writing, music, painting and other powers, which prove outside help from higher intelligences. Impressions, dreams, visions, automatic writing, trance mediumship and many other forms of a mental character.

There are probably but a very few families in which some kind of mental mediumship could not be developed if they would give the subject a reasonable amount of time and attention, and much pleasure and satisfaction would come to them from such development. Besides the mental phases of mediumship already mentioned there are a number of manifestations which come under the head of physical mediumship. Among those most commonly produced are the moving of tables, furniture and other objects by a power beyond that of the sitters, raps which respond to questions given by those present. Then independent voices are sometimes heard; also telegraphic raps which give intelligent communication to those who understand the telegraphic code; musical instruments which float through the air, at the same time keeping time and tune with those present who sing familiar tunes. Again there is the very convincing phase of receiving independent slate writing in broad daylight; also occasionally the wonderful phenomena of materialization, where the previously unseen visitor takes on a temporary material appearance visible to all present.

Surely this is a grand work, and worthy of our best thought and most earnest effort to so develop the latent spiritual powers which are our divine birthright and inheritance, that we may be able to satisfy ourselves of the presence of our angel visitors, and demonstrate to a world of sorrow stricken mourners that life is continuous and fear of the grave has been swallowed up in victory. And then, above all and beyond all these manifestations which prove to us the certainty of a life beyond the confines of earthly existence, we have the opportunity of gaining knowledge of our future from those whose experience in the spirit life enables them to become teachers to those who still inhabit earthly tabernacles. This knowledge can be gained in no other way but by coming in touch with our friends who have had actual experience. Then why should we hesitate about commencing our investigations? Why not avail ourselves of the opportunity to come into communication? Many difficulties may present themselves at first, mistakes may occur as in all the avenues for gathering knowledge, but if we will be patient, if we will perseveringly investigate, the door of knowledge will be opened unto us. Wisdom will be given which is far above the price of rubies, and a satisfaction will come to us which can be gained in no other way. We shall add to our faith, knowledge; we shall know "There is no death; what seems so is transition."

WILLIAM E. BONNEY.

BE BRAVE.

In life's darkest hour
Should adversity lower,
And troubles in legions appear,
Should friends remain few
Who will prove to thee true,
And Courage strikes hands with dark Fear;

Be brave—let thy heart
And thy hands do their part,
Toil on in thy trust and thy might;
I will be to thee true
If my paths you pursue,
Says the Law which governs the Right.

Should the wail of the blast
As it goes sweeping past
Make sadder thy cold cheerless morn,
Should bold specters pale
As they ride on the gale,
Point at thee with fingers of scorn;

Bend not to the stroke,
Yonder proud forest oak
Is reaching above to the sun;
Toil on for the good,
Where those dark spirits stood
Are angelic legion to one.

Agreeably Surprised.

The Progressive Thinker and four beautiful volumes arrived promptly. They are absolutely satisfactory in every particular.

I expected something cheap, but was agreeably surprised. Art Magic alone is worth what I paid for the four books and the paper. If you are financially in a condition to do this kind of missionary work you will certainly be rewarded in the Spirit-world. Truly your friend, PHENOMENAL.

Puzzling Occurrences of a Psychic Nature.

A brand new experience came to me last Tuesday morning. I guess it will do to go on paper, for it is the first thing of the kind that ever came to me, and I do not believe it is common to mankind, but some exceptional cases. Well, here it goes in detail, as near as my limited ability can write facts.

Tuesday morning I started for the postoffice to get my mail matter. As I was passing the second house from my own, my attention was attracted to the vibration of an ordinary fence wire that was stretched from post to post, with others, as a lawn protection. The middle wire kept up an incessant vibration, while the others were entirely motionless. There was not even a breath of wind, cat, dog, beast, bird, or human astir, and being much inclined to look for causes of things, I halted to watch the vibration of the wire that labored with considerable vigor. I could see no cause, but said to myself the wire is sensitive attached to the posts, which were about 10 feet apart, and the vibration has been started by some object unseen or before I was attracted to it.

Without any discovery of the cause I passed on the length of a block, then crossed the street westward. Then a scene more wonderful and puzzling than before confronted me. It was apparently three young shade trees standing in a row, on a residence lawn, about fifteen feet high. The tops, judging from appearance, were about five or six feet apart. Here I was more surprised than ever, because the center tree shook and vibrated with some invisible force, while its companions were motionless. I stopped as before to look for a cause. I could feel no breeze, see no birds and no person was in sight. The tree seemed to shake as a human would, by vibratory force of his arms and the motion seemed regular, as I stood to consider the scene. The trees were taking on their summer foliage, all about of a size, and perfect specimens for trees of their size. I took them for the white elm variety. The tree suddenly stopped its vibration, stood as mute and motionless as its companions, and I mentally said to myself, if some full-fledged Spiritualist was here he would say here is a splendid spiritual manifestation in the pure and the natural, no human jugglery about it, and I know what I see is reality.

After taking in the scene, its beauty of returning bloom, I went on to the office, got my papers, but my mind was too much exercised to be held down by ordinary matter. I studied all day about the scene and resolved to go the next morning to study the matter and see what I could learn. Well, I went, and was more dumbfounded than ever. The scene, trees and all, had utterly vanished, root and branch. It was purely mental and optical delusion, the morning before, for the things I saw are not where I saw them at all. But why this delusive scene? It was as real for the time as any other scene, and the idea of delusion, a phantom, never entered my mind, until I went the next morning to learn more about it. Then the spell was broken. The old familiar scene, lawn and shrubbery, as it really exists, was there in fact, yet I saw it not, but all was wonderfully new and strange the morning before, a sight undreamed of until present, it stood in front of me in the warm, glowing sunlight of the first May morning of 1900.

Spiritualism enters this shadowy realm, and sees a world beyond where the average mortal cannot tread by reason of limited spiritual power and perception, while a powerful priesthood has been able to see every phase of Spiritualism that can create royal robes and golden crown, and revel in the divine will of the almighty one, in all their satanic robberies and enslavement of the bodies and souls of men.

As Spiritualists we are never out of the woods until the dark river is crossed, where the mortal never treads, and the light thrown back, seems so wonderfully human it makes me pause to reason upon these mental sights, these optical delusions, and often wearied utterances of tongue and pen. We all have mentality, its central light is reason and thought in the light of our experience of the past; and I guess one life at a time well lived will insure the best success after all. Nature endows all created life, with the principle of wisdom, as the mother of all, and that wisdom is the adaptation of that life to its peculiar requirements in the sphere it occupies in space.

With man I seem to know the mental is the wisdom of nature injected into his mentality through the human senses, ever in touch with those elements and agencies of nature that build all life from some lower form of matter, she touches with her magic wand. The combination of elements, expressive of inherent wisdom, of forces that can create life, with the enduring energies of living worlds, and mighty systems, clothed with the supreme and unfailing wisdom that never dims nor dies, nor ceases to exert its supremacy in the control of all, from the atom to teeming systems of suns and satellites. How faint at last is our glimpse of the vast reality of things. Who comprehends this innate wisdom in the perfect blending of the supreme in nature, that thrusts out a thousand forms of life in harmony with all its diverging lines and spheres of occupation, and yet one grand harmonial whole. Every extreme at last in nature, belongs to the harmonial keyboard of heaven's music. Worlds would be incomplete without the strong bass note of the rumbling of earthquakes, the typhoon, the roar of raging seas, with all their intermediate notes from these, to gentle zephyrs laden with the balmy fragrance of nature's fairest isles.

Humanity has its sphere of action, cast upon the moments of time in this vale of life and death. He is to-day, but the morrow knows him not, for the light as to him, in the great beyond is yet dim and doubtful. I trust alone in the wisdom of nature's unfailing good, while I strive to find the more harmonial relations to her order and law, and steer clear of the breakers that too often wreck life ere nature's design has been reached in him (if nature hath design as well as force). FOR FREE CAMPS,

And a Good Many More of Them.

To the Editor:—In No. 543 of your valuable journal "A Worker" criticises my camp article which appeared in No. 542. I was glad to see the clear, fearless, independent criticism of "Worker," it invites a reply. "Worker" admits the principal suggestion is a stride in advance, but thinks I should make a greater demand. Why should he think so? Do I not know what I would like? I said our camps ought to be free, like our parks; I made a reasonable suggestion from my point of view; I want equality and justice, no more nor less. If our camps were all free "to campers," and one or more established in each state, thousands whom "Worker" says are too poor to take long journeys and pay car-fare could and would attend without car-fare.

Dr. Conger did not offer to work for his board, but did accept of an invitation to teach practical medicine—the gospel of health, that sin and sickness are results, not necessities—without pay. "Worker's" insinuation "that Dr. Conger has a side-line to work, an axe to grind outside of his mediumistic work," is without foundation. Dr. Conger is not a side-line worker and has never had any axe, or axes, to grind. I am a publisher of health books and have them for sale at all times, sell less during the camp month than any other month of the year.

A crisis is on in material and spiritual expressions; what has our missionary "Worker" to suggest better than the multiplication of our camps, making them free in the sense that our churches are free, and by adopting similar methods to increase and prepare them for camp use and work.

For the past forty-five years we have organized, organized and organized, built temples, churches, and halls; all efforts thus far that have squinted, looked or tended towards old church methods have failed, except our camps; they have had a slow but steady growth for twenty years and only a few failures; why not take a hint and hitch on where there seems to be an opportunity for practical foundation work. If fifteen more states would make camps upon the free plan, and fifteen or twenty more could be added to the states that now have them, fifty or seventy-five thousand could attend, and would, instead of twenty or twenty-five thousand. All experience that is valuable gained by church methods, is ours to profit by; it is an established fact that free churches and the methods used to make them are practical, and the best; our camps can adopt them to our advantage, why not? Some practical foundation work must be done if we expect to command the attention and respect of the public; spread-eagle efforts at Washington, Boston, New York, or Chicago will not command the practical clear-headed public.

In reply to "Worker's" question whether one month would be sufficient for spiritual missionary work for the year at our camps, I answer most emphatically, yes; from my point of view all missionary efforts except only the Salvation Army are unworthy of notice. It is birth and growth, not patent incubators, it is generation not regeneration, that should be considered by ambitious missionaries. We are not engaged in deceptive, priestly soul-saving schemes; some of us are much interested in the care of our bodies, and there is a glorious opportunity, and a large field for health reformers even in our spiritual ranks. If all our ambitious missionaries would open their eyes and ears and join the Salvation Army, they could find a life job in any one of a dozen of our large cities, but spending carfare to reach our western prairies, and there join the tramp brigade to hunt heathen to spiritualize, is to say the least, ridiculous.

If intelligent people outside of our thickly-settled communities and cities do not care enough about the philosophy, truth, and phenomena of Spiritualism to subscribe for a weekly paper like The Progressive Thinker, costing only $1, a year, let 'em starve; they don't need the missionary, but a little common horse sense. Any missionary effort would be a waste of time and cold cash on them.

Again I call upon "Worker" for practical suggestions, and as I said in my former paper, I am ready to accept any practical suggestion that will bring Spiritualism to the front, to do something that will enlist, enthuse and unite the great and constantly increasing number who are seeking light.

THEY COME IN DREAMS.

They come to me in dreams, betimes,
The dear ones gone before,
They sit beside me at the hearth,
Go out and in my door;
They rarely speak, but flit about
In each accustomed place,
The while it gives me joy to view
Each well-remembered face.

I waken with a sob of pain
That it is but a dream,
And yet they're near me all the day,
So real does it seem.
They comfort me through all the hours
Of labor, and of rest.
I feel that I have touched the hem
Of garments of the blest.

Dear dwellers on the distant shore;
Come near me when you may,
Let memories of my happy dreams
Make sweet the waking day.
With joys and griefs, and loving toil,
The years draw on apace,
When dreams shall be realities,
And meetings face to face.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

If every man, animal, reptile, insect, fish, and all vegetable life, were swept off your earth to-day, in a comparatively short space of time, all these things would exist in every part of your globe. The oceans, seas, rivers, ponds, and lakes, would be filled with fish, insect, reptile, and animal life would appear; and, lastly, man. It would not be many thousands of years before man would be civilized. Now this would not take place in one little spot at a time, but would be simultaneous in every part of your earth. Man makes a great mistake when he supposes that it takes countless ages for things to evolve from a speck of protoplasm—as though it commenced with one little speck and then all must be evolved from that—or, that one ape gradually evolved into one man in one particular spot of the earth.

Oh, no, my friends, this is not so; although, in tropical climes evolution goes on more rapidly than it does in colder regions.

If your earth to-day was one mass of solid rock and water, as it certainly was when life first made its appearance upon it, this is how evolution did and would take place. The moment rock, on every part of the globe, crumbled slightly, enough to hold a little moisture, moss would immediately form simultaneously all over the globe; at the same time within the waters the very lowest form of life. The atmosphere would immediately supply all necessary germs, and just as rapidly as nature could involve, higher and still higher forms would appear—until the lowest or savage man—on every island and continent, nearly at the same time, according as climatic conditions were more or less favorable. Not one man alone, but millions of men—race after race of savage men—and the world would come up then, just as it has done, into civilization, the angelic world aiding it as rapidly as it was capable of being aided.

"Well," you ask me, "how could that be possible if the spiritual spheres had not been peopled from the earth?"

Why, my friends, there are millions upon millions of earths in just the condition we have described, at the present time, but, on the other hand, there are millions upon millions of other planets that are progressed far, very far, beyond these earths, and there are countless millions of spirits and angels from these planets who can be, and are, interested in these crude earths, working with and for them. How else would intelligence and spirituality ever appear?

Go out and gaze into the vault of heaven at the countless stars which are suns to other systems of worlds that cannot be seen with the naked eye; then consider that all these worlds are co-related and you will get an idea of my meaning.

There are those on your earth at the present time who attract spiritual beings from other planets, especially from Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Venus, Neptune; but Mercury has, as yet, no inhabitants, it being the youngest or last ring thrown off from the sun. It is still too crude and young. It is yet basking in the hot rays of the sun and presents little else, at the present time, except rock and water, and has somewhat the appearance of your moon, filled with great yawning chasms, bursting volcanos and boiling oceans, as your earth was in its youthful period and your earth will, eventually, be as Neptune is now, after having passed through the various gradations of the planets belonging to your system which are beyond it.

Now the very ancient spirits, who once inhabited your earth, are not so vastly superior to the wisest and most spiritual men of earth—and why?

Because as soon as these former souls left the earth, as rapidly as they gained in wisdom they must work for and impart it to those still in the body. This is the only way that any progress can be made. If angels here simply thought only of their own progress and happiness, never looking back to aid the ones left behind, they would not be worthy of all wisdom or happiness, and consequently would be neither wise nor happy. They strive for knowledge and happiness and then turn, or descend, and impart it to those below them; therefore you can see at once that the wisest ones who have left earth cannot be very far in advance of the wisest ones of earth, their proteges.

Now this is a great truth that many overlook. Spirits and angels must work, and work continually, for there are millions of spirits here, low, ignorant, debased and degraded. These must be taught as well as the people of earth. No time for idleness here—no time for selfish enjoyment alone. We must give of our knowledge and happiness almost as fast as we receive it.

For instance, Harriet Beecher Stowe, when she wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin, said she did not, personally, write it. God wrote it through her. She told the truth. She was but the instrument used by higher powers, or angels, and the angel who personally controlled her she mistook for God, not understanding the law of spirit control. One spirit must control, but the principles or truths given may be from many or various ones.

Dear Carlyle, I have met Mrs. Stowe since she came to this life. You, of course, remember when she essayed to give readings from her books, and you were the pianist on that occasion, and what a dismal failure she made of it?

She thought, and said, that God could write through her, but when it came to reading, the people must do that for themselves.

She is much interested in you and yours and is here with me now. She says, as she listened to your music, on the occasion just mentioned, she thought God was playing through you as he had written through her. She says, it was the most heavenly music she had ever heard.

The dear little lady was somewhat disappointed when she first arrived here, for she had felt sure that she would see God. She reasoned that if God had considered her worthy to write for him, she would be taken immediately into his presence when she left the body; but she was soon reconciled and is now exceedingly bright and happy. Her appearance is very beautiful indeed—small, dainty, sparkling and bright; looking twenty-five or perhaps thirty years of age. She has met the one who controlled her to write Uncle Tom's Cabin, and they have been quite gleeful together over that fact. She is now prepared to control someone, yet in earth life, herself, and she tells me that she hopes to write a greater book than Uncle Tom's Cabin ever was, and she is looking for a medium through whom to write it. She touches a great many mediums here and there and has been able to write a few sentences, but she wants to write a book entire. She says she has it all outlined in her mind—that is, her spirit has already composed or written the book and now it remains for her to give it down through a medium. She says she calls the book War, or Hell and Devil versus Heaven, God and the Angels.

By this you can perceive how it is with us all. As soon as she gets wisdom she desires immediately to give it to earth through some one who is capable of being her amanuensis. You see by this that earth and its surrounding spiritual spheres must go very nearly hand in hand. How eager I was to write to you shortly after arriving here. I had a had time overcoming conditions but by persevering I conquered and, I then also wrote a book and after that many other books. When Mrs. Stowe writes her book I shall be one to help on in the inspiration; of course I mean Helena and myself. The angel world was determined at the time they wrote the book through Mrs. Stowe, to emancipate the colored race, and they did so through the influence they exerted, directly, upon certain human beings—Abraham Lincoln and Mrs. Stowe being the chief ones—but in order to do this war must ensue. Hell and the Devil must be let loose that Heaven and the Angels might conquer—and they did conquer. Mrs. Stowe says that another war must come to the American nation in order, this time, that the souls of men may be set free; for the bondage of the mind is more terrible than that of the body.

My dear son, I have long prophesied this coming war, as you well know, and this time it will be a religious war for the freedom of the mind.

The Romish church will, before long, take the reins of the government of the United States of America into its powerful hands and again the chariots of war will rush madly over that fair country. But the angels will inspire, and raise up new leaders, new writers, and, at last, this powerful usurper will be overthrown and cast into the sea of oblivion. The head of the serpent will be crushed and ground beneath the heel—the heel of the angelic world—but a dreadful war will first take place and once more blood will flow in your fair land.

Now you ask why cannot the angels bring peace to us instead of war? I will tell you why; but, first, I will ask you, why could not the angels bring peace instead of war in the days of Abraham Lincoln? Because one power said, "We will hold the black man in bondage;" the other power said, "No, thou shalt not! Man shall be free whether he be black, white or copper-colored. Man is man, whatever his color or race."

Now the conservative portion of the orthodox world will join hands with the Romish power and the great power then will say "We will hold the minds of men in bondage. They shall not go free. They shall think as we think and do as we do—or do as we command them to do." The other power will say, "We will have our freedom to do as we please. We will think for ourselves. We will not be in bondage." And again the clash of armed men, the booming cannon, the roar, smoke, and carnage of war. But the scarlet woman will be beaten—wounded unto death—aye, she will be slain never to rise again on your fair globe!

The angels cannot avoid these things even if they would, but they place themselves on the side of right and by thus doing truth usually becomes victorious and old error is slain.

Dear Carlyle, there are many other spirits who would like to put in a few words occasionally—souls that you and I were well acquainted with when they and I were with you in the form—and I am sure it makes me happy to give their messages, or allow them, as I have Mr. Ingersoll, to write a few words for themselves. But all mediums should be guarded by one particular control in order to do very much good. You, in earth life, do not let all sorts of people promiscuously into your homes, neither do you associate with the wicked and debased, and the law holds good here as well; still, we must try to save, or reach the helping hand to all.

My dear son, I am glad to say that thought photography is about to be given to the earthly world. You know that I have been telling you, for a number of years, that photography would soon prove, beyond the shadow of a doubt, to the whole world at large the great truth of continued existence. This is just on the eve of being realized and will become as well established as the telegraph or telephone. Not to the few who are called Spiritualists, but to all the world.

You think this alone ought to put a stop to the internecine war that Mrs. Stowe has prophesied; but she thinks it will not. There are millions of spirits near the earth who are still Catholics—believing themselves in purgatory—and their sympathies will be with the Catholic power. They will aid in causing war and will, no doubt, possess and obsess very many who will, at that time, be in power. How soon this war will take place, Mrs. Stowe cannot tell; but she says, she is certain that before twenty years have gone by. She is more particularly interested in these matters than I am, consequently takes more pains to inform herself on the subject; but to return to spirit photography, which interests me exceedingly. It has become known to many that thoughts have already been photographed. One step more and all I have said to you in the past will be actualized. In all the books that have been written by us to you, we have constantly asserted that thoughts were things that could be seen and enjoyed by all spiritual beings.

Many laughed and sneered at the idea, thinking you must be crazy. Some held it up to ridicule, saying that eternity could not hold all the thoughts that had been evolved from the minds of mankind. But such will soon be put to blush and will find out to their amazement that thoughts are really things, and very tangible ones, too, for an intangible thing cannot be photographed.

Oh, my dear boy, keep your courage up to the sticking point, for you are about to be righted before the whole world. Not only will spirits be photographed but scenes in spirit life, and whole messages or letters will be precipitated at once upon a sensitive plate. This will not occur particularly with so-called mediums, but with all and everyone who makes photography a study. Your own dear mother wrote this to you, and to the world at large, in her book, "Mary Ann Carew;" and, even to you, it seemed more like romance than truth. The book was written some eight or nine years ago when the idea of thought photography had not yet been entertained, but in all the schools in the celestial world it has long been taught and practiced. Your mother, in that book, told you of a school where your little sisters were being educated, and described to you their method of painting pictures.

You remember how little Katy painted the picture of the white heifer with a wreath of dandelion blossoms about her neck, also the picture of her mother, hurling the bottle at the head of the negro, and how the children were taught to concentrate their minds on that which they wished reproduced, and by thus doing the thought went forth in undulating, or vibratory waves; from their minds, thus striking the sensitized plate and forming the picture.

Now as soon as the people of earth are able, and can accept these great scientific facts, they are given to them. But, of course, the books which we wrote were premature in one sense, yet not so, after all, for even if one mind can be controlled to give forth a great truth, other minds soon follow, and, shortly it becomes an established fact. Now photography will also soon prove that animal life exists here in the celestial world, and then people will begin to realize what cannibals they are, and gradually meat-eating and the slaying of animals will forever cease, and animals will not be propagated for the sake of eating their material bodies. It is scarcely worse for the native cannibal to eat the missionary than for the civilized man to eat his cow, ox, or the innocent sheep and playful lamb; and the earth would produce few of these if they were not especially propagated for the purpose of eating.

THE ADVENT OF JUNE.

I have watched for your coming, fair rosy-cheeked June,
While the days slowly lengthened and grew,
And the violets and grasses with dew-drops were strewn,
Reflecting the beautiful blue.

And the world seemed in raptures of sweetness and song,
Their echoes from mountains and hill
Where the birdlings gather in woodlands, and throng,
In nestlings their love-vows fulfill.

And a message has flashed from the hill-tops afar,
That told me your coming was near,
And I've read their signals in cloud-lands and star,
And the earth has a new word of cheer.

Ah! rosy-cheeked June, sweet heart of the year,
How our hearts beat in rapture anew,
As fond memories dear awaken a tear
For the old hearts faithful and true.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE MEDIUM FRITZ MUELLER.

The following extract from a letter written by Madame Melba, from Berlin, on the 28th of November last, was published in the Argus of the 5th of January:

"I must tell you that I have just seen and heard Fritz Mueller, and I don't wonder that you rave about him. He is a wonder. Joachim was having lunch with me yesterday, and he commenced to talk of a wonderful little boy who had just arrived from Australia. I asked his name, and he said, 'Fritz Mueller.' I jumped, and said, 'Tell me about him.' So, with tears in his dear eyes, he said that the little fellow was brought to him, and sat down and played Beethoven and Bach, and his own little composition, in such a wonderful way that he was at once admitted into the school, although the rule is that no pupil can enter until he is 14 years of age. He went on to say that he is sure that he will be very great some day. Max Busch is also crazy about him—so you see he is in good hands. I sent for him and his mother and they have just gone. What a wonder he is! I still have tears in my eyes and a lump in my throat. I gave him the £50, but made the mother promise she would leave him with Joachim until he is ready to play in public. It will be a dreadful sin if the child is not kept at work till he is grown up, and ready to appear in public. The little fellow has captured my heart, and I shall do anything I can for his future. What a wonderful thing genius is?"

Now it is well known to a number of persons in Melbourne, beside myself, that Fritz is an inspirational medium, gifted with the faculties of clairvoyance and clairaudience. I have heard him describe with great accuracy each of the band of controls who were around him, when he sat down to compose, or to improvise on the instrument; namely, Beethoven (his special guide), Mozart, Handel, Haydn, Weber and Wagner. These were just as real to him as his own father and mother. I saw a good deal of him four years ago, in my own house, and elsewhere, when he was under the able tuition of Madame Politz, an accomplished pianiste; and have had many communications concerning him from Beethoven, who declared his intention of composing through him—I quote his own words—"Seven different marches, symbolical of the seven different lives a human being leads on earth, and his spiritual development in each"

And in view of Fritz Mueller's future eminence as a composer, the true story of his development deserves to be placed on record for future reference. I can certify to its accuracy. In May, 1896, Mr. J. W. Sutton, a highly successful developing medium, was introduced to little Fritz in his own home, by the lady whose name I have just mentioned. On entering the house, Mr. Sutton received clairaudiently the names of Beethoven, Mozart, Wagner and Mendelssohn, and was almost immediately controlled by the first of these, who directed the boy to take his seat at the piano, and began to magnetize him; at the same time requesting him to play whatever came into his head. Fritz did so; and the control beat time, as the conductor of an orchestra might do. The medium was not wholly unconscious, and seemed to know every note that was about to be struck upon the instrument; while at the same time, his own personality was merged in that of Beethoven; and Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Weber, Wagner and other composers, with whose faces he was unfamiliar, were recognized as standing in a semi-circle round the piano. Fritz improvised two compositions, and Beethoven was asked to describe them. He said the first was a Polonaise in F., and the second a Legato in C minor. Having been further asked if the boy had played them correctly, he answered, "Perfectly. I played them myself." His father, who was present, was astounded at the marvelous performance of his son; and declared that he had never heard him play like that before. In fact it was altogether astonishing. The boy seemed to be perfect master of the keyboard; and the power and pathos of the two compositions which he improvised, without a moment's hesitation and without a flow, were impressive in the extreme. The control again directed him to sit down to the instrument and play what would be given to him. This he did, with results still more startling than before.

Abruptly turning around when he had finished, Fritz declared that the medium was no longer visible, but that Beethoven occupied the position in which Mr. Sutton had been standing, and that he also saw the musicians I have previously enumerated.

From that time forth, many opportunities were offered to Mr. S. for developing the mediumistic faculties of Fritz Mueller, while his technical training made steady progress under the sympathetic tuition of Madame Politz. After awhile, however, one member of his family thought proper to withdraw the boy from all spiritualistic influences. It was considered desirable that he should figure as a youthful prodigy, and steps were taken to raise a fund to send himself and his mother to Europe, greatly to the chagrin of the great composers, who contemplated making him a second Sebastian Bach; for this, they all of them declare, is the name he bore in his last earth-life.

From many communications which I myself have received in reference to him during the last four years, I select the following:

Speaking of Fritz Mueller, on the 4th of November, 1896, Beethoven said: "He would have developed under the most unfavorable circumstances; but how easy his development proved to be for us! because, owing to his having been brought into contact with this medium (Mr. J. W. Sutton), we have been saved two or three years of hard work, and have accomplished that work in two or three months. Of course, the boy is exceptionally gifted. This is the kind of teaching (i. e., by the development of his mediumship), which the world does not understand—as yet; but, in the near future, this form of instruction will be universal. Give that boy to a hard-headed, inflexible tutor in a German conservatorium and he would be ruined by excessive practice, because his health would eventually break down. He will be better known as a composer than as an executant. Don't let him be sent away. His present teacher (Madame Politz) can give him all the technik he wants, and we will do the rest. He is both clairvoyant and clairaudient, and he sees and hears us so vividly that there is no doubt in his mind as to our objective reality."

Among many other communications from Beethoven, with respect to little Fritz Mueller's mediumship, most of them expressing the greatest anxiety that the boy should not be sent to Germany, where his genius would be dwarfed and deformed by teachers ignorant of its real nature, and of the best conditions for its development, was one on the 12th of December, 1896, from which I make the following extract:

"Twelve months hence, if we can preserve the same magnetic conditions around him as those which now exist, he will be able to give a concert in public, the programme of which should consist of his own compositions exclusively. But we have to watch him very carefully, so as to prevent any busy bodies from spoiling him for our use. This would be the case if he should become a mere virtuoso on the piano-forte. Therefore we wish this medium (through whom Beethoven was speaking at the time) to magnetize the boy, in order to strengthen our influence over him. His mother is afraid of his being mesmerized; but he will be so, by us, in spite of her, just as I was, in my own earth-life; and if he is only allowed to follow his own impulses and impressions, he will be an ornament to the world."

Again, on the 11th of February, 1897, Beethoven said:

"People are always ready to rush a musical prodigy on the platform; but how many of these have been ruined by being farmed out for notoriety and money! We want to save him from such a fate as this, for we have thus been deprived of many a medium who has been snapped up by some mercenary manager, who has made a fortune out of the prodigy, but who has ruined the musician as an artist. We hope little Fritz will go before the world as an avowed medium, who plays and composes under spirit influence. Others have debased and degraded their divine gifts by making them subservient to sordid purposes; and money tarnishes and defiles everything it touches in the world of art. The medium who loves money ceases to be a true artist. His mercenary aims and desires interpose a barrier between himself and us. Little Fritz sees, recognizes, and knows every one of us. We are just as real to him as he is to you. You could not induce that boy to disbelieve that he is controlled by Beethoven for any consideration you could offer him [this was perfectly true then], because he knows that it is we who give him those divine harmonies. We play upon him, just as he plays upon his instrument. Where did he acquire his technik? From no earthly teacher. It was latent in him, and we have simply developed it. * * Those who want to make a machine of him for coining gold will only cripple and possibly destroy him."

On the 27th of March, 1899, Beethoven returned to the subject, remarking:

"We are sorry that our little pupil—notwithstanding all our efforts to the contrary—is about to be dragged out of his seclusion. We wished him to become an instrument for Spiritualism, and to be known far and wide as a musical medium; but the ambition of —— has thwarted us. We have interposed hindrances of all kinds; but it seems that we can no longer keep him in quietude. * * You can imagine the magnitude of our mortification at having our plans frustrated by the cupidity and conceit of the boy's relations, for those are the adverse influences which are at work."

Other communications of a later date convey the disappointment felt by the great German composers at the injudicious transfer of the boy to Germany, instead of leaving his genius to blossom and expand, as a flower does, without the hot-house forcing to which it will now be exposed, at the hands of teachers who are completely ignorant of the fact that genius and mediumship are convertible terms, and that the precious gift runs a very serious risk of being perverted and even suppressed by well-meant but erroneous and pernicious methods of so-called culture. If Robert Burns had been sent to the University of Edinburgh, and crammed with Greek, Latin and Mathematics, would he ever have written the Cotter's Saturday Night or Tam o' Shanter, or his immortal songs?

A CARD.

The principals of Belvidere Seminary would respectfully inform their friends and the public generally that this institution will be open during the summer and early autumn for the accommodation of children and adults who seek freedom from business cares or the excitement of social and fashionable life. Its location is healthy and beautiful, its grounds ample and well shaded, drainage and water excellent.

Belvidere, as its name indicates, is a beautiful inland town, in Northern New Jersey, 700 feet above the sea, and surrounded on all sides by forest-covered hills, at the base of which flow the Pequest and Delaware rivers, along whose banks are many places of special interest to artists and all lovers of the picturesque in nature.

Its streets are well shaded and lighted with electricity. In its near vicinity are well cultivated farms, from which a fresh supply of milk, eggs, butter, fresh fruits and vegetables can be had daily. It is only twelve miles from Easton, Pa., and ten miles from the Delaware Water Gap. It is easy of access from New York and Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania and Delaware, Lackawanna & Western railroads, with six trains running daily each way. Its walks and drives are exceptionally fine, presenting an ever pleasing variety of river and mountain scenery. Here is just the place for the weary to find repose and the recreation that invigorates without fatiguing. For further particulars, address A. C. BUSH,

HOPE'S INSPIRATION.

We're out upon life's great highway
And going swiftly on.
This mundane term seems but a day
So soon 'tis spent and gone!

Our span of years, "three score and ten"
Is but the starting time
Of a career that never ends,
As on, and up we climb!

We sometimes halt along the road
To pluck the flowers fair,
Or, weary, sink beneath the load
Of earthly toil and care,

And fain would cast our burdens down
When toiling up the hills;
But Hope extends a shining crown
To recompense our ills;

And whispers promises of peace
When all our work is done;
Our slothful progress to increase
While thus she lures us on!

And were it not for that bright hope,
"'Tis better farther on,"
In our extended spirit scope,
The charm of life were gone!

A. Schopenhauer Essays.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75c.

CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life: Counsels and Maxims;; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

"God Junior." = = By Charles Dawbarn.

I have shown, at least to my own satisfaction, in my article entitled "The Size of Man," that there is no such limit to manhood as taught by ignorance, and endorsed by both present-day science and theology. I therein asserted that Ego occupies the whole of a certain space in Cosmos, in which space he exists and manifests his finite sonship to the infinite. To draw a picture of man as composed of a bunch of hair, then a great space, and at last a few toe nails, would be exactly as sensible as to assert that Ego has a few senses at one end of his manhood, then a huge gap, and the rest of him shivering in loneliness at the other. Yet such is the supposed manhood of to-day.

I claimed and pictured Ego as having no dark, unexplored and unoccupied continent between his head and his toes. The region between the few vibrations of sound and the myriad vibrations of thought I claimed as actually occupied by Ego in the eternal now. That energy and ether compel him to certain limited personalities, existing at the same time, is a fact which man the mortal is, at last, beginning to dimly comprehend. I further claimed that this conception of the extension of manhood is in harmonious accord with facts of science and the dreams of philosophy.

I pictured man as Infinite Intelligence flashed into space, and thereby personified into finite limitation. I showed that the finite can only comprehend that which is personified. I illustrated this thought by the existence of electricity in our atmosphere, which is absolutely beyond description or comprehension until by flash or spark it is individualized, when we think of it, talk of it, and photograph it into permanency. We thus grasp, realize and photograph man as a spark or flash of the Infinite Intelligence, hurled by energy into the ether, and therein compelled to evolute, step by step, into the fullness of an Ego.

The point I merely hinted at in that article I want now to elaborate a little more fully. If the reader grasped my thought he perceived that Ego, being a finite expression of the infinite, necessarily contains within himself every power of the infinite that can be expressed in a finite individuality. This power will belong to him as an Ego. And, yet further, as an Ego he must be capable of expressing this power throughout the entire range of vibratory expressions possible to him in Cosmos. If Ego be expressing himself through but a portion of his own vibratory possibilities that manifestation will stand to us as a personality, which is, to that extent, limited in power, although his powers are necessarily divine, so far as they can outreach.

There is a Divine Ideality of Godhood in comparison with which Ego must always stand as a very limited personality. And by the same law or rule of comparison Ego's own lesser personalities have in their turn an ideal Ego to which they stand as but puny and fractional personalities of a mighty whole.

If my thought has been grasped, and it is acknowledged that the powers of Ego must be enormous compared to those wielded by any of his own limited personalities; and, yet further, if we realize that each one of us is really an Ego holding this sublime relation to the Highest, then we are now prepared to endeavor to place such startling truths in their proper relation to our life of to-day.

Creative Thought is itself evidence of Divinity. We have seen that Ego is himself born of such a thought. But as a child of the Infinite, and with a Divine inheritance, he himself has also his own power of Creative Thought. It will be possessed by himself as Ego in a fulness impossible to his own fractional personalities, but will always be held and wielded in proportion to the vibratory energies he can compel to his service. In other words man the mortal will have a certain portion of Creative Thought Power. Man the spirit will wield yet more of it. And further personalities of Ego will each use the same divine prerogative. At the same time we can now see that Ego himself will always compel the whole that belongs to him to his constant service.

We now turn to the one manifestation of Ego with which we are familiar—that of mortal man—to discover if he presents evidence of the truth of the claim that he actually possesses and wields his share of this Divine Creative Power.

The term "creator" is always used by every scientific mind in the sense of a manufacturer who takes certain existing raw material and blends and shapes its pre-existing atoms to a designed form and use. The old conception of a something created out of nothing by divine will has become absurd to the thinker of to-day. We are therefore discussing the fact of Creative Power itself, which, in its fulness, is wielded by what we call Great First Cause, and which same power in its lesser manifestation, and working amid the same raw material, becomes objective through the Creative Power of Man.

Thought is to-day recognized as the directive and creative power of the universe. Man has always thought from brain to brain through space by means of the vibration of the ether. To-day, by using an instrument of metal, he vibrates his thought to a sister instrument a thousand miles away. Or he flashes rays of sunshine, impregnated with his thought, across a space limited only by the curving surface of the earth. Such are mortal man's manifestations of "thought flashes" through space. But at every step of his progress man has been materializing his thought. Every invention is a materialized thought. No man builds bridge, steamship or temple until he has first constructed it in thought. Every detail must be thought out, or his design is a failure. These are surface truths of to-day. I now want to invite the student reader to a thought excursion into realms that he has not dreamed were ruled by man.

First, let us remember that unmaterialized thought forms cannot be destroyed by fire or water. They neither rust nor decay. They are registered in vibrations of the ether, and will therefore reappear whenever, or wherever their vibrations are repeated. Man is constantly erecting thought structures which remain amidst thought vibrations, and are not even intended to be solidified into the forms of mortal life. Man is thus constantly Creating Man. This startling assertion I propose to prove, and then note some of the equally startling effects of this use of man's Creative Power.

The success of the novelist depends upon his creation of human beings who live and act as naturally and as forcefully as your next door neighbor or dearest friend. A "David Copperfield," or "John Halifax, Gentleman," is just as real to every reader as any relative or acquaintance. He is alive, as other human beings are alive. He is intellectually and spiritually alive. You know as well what he will say, do and think under any special circumstances as you could prophesy the action of your father or son. His life force depends upon how well he is created in every detail. The actor gives you but part of a man. The successful author rounds him out till as child, boy and man nothing is lacking. The inferior writer makes a botch of his job, but Nature, or First Cause, does the same when she moulds an idiot, and she usually leaves out some important detail in every one of us. There is no difference in this Creative Power save in degree. The historian merely tries to do for some of the human beings created by First Cause that which the mortal Creative Artist does for the men and women he projects. The student will notice that both alike are made out of the same materials. All live and move amid the same ethereal vibrations, and are subject to the same laws.

There is a tremendous truth embodied in this assertion. Human Creations by First Cause are, as we have seen, occupying a sphere of vibrations that, however extensive, is limited at either end. Human Creations by Second Cause also occupy a sphere of their own, but more limited than that of their Creator. They are still more curtailed at either end. They never touch physical vibrations, nor can we conceive of them, at the other extreme, as enjoying evolution, and ultimately climbing godward. In a word, Man the Created, can, no more than First Cause, create a being equal to himself. So man's thought-created men and women are never endowed with physical bodies. Their vibrations commence with the ideal. In the psychical sphere these creations are as much alive as any creation by First Cause. Whether man's creations contain any element of progress, and can ever reach out into the spiritual is a point I leave for future discussion and examination. Let us take then a universally known character such as David Copperfield and analyze him. The student cannot, nor could Dickens himself materialize him, for he would only be a manufactured copy of a thought, like everything else man creates. As we have seen, the inventor's proudest production is a thought embodied in materials the mortal can sense.

A David Copperfield if created by First Cause has a scope that permits him experience in the material, the psychic and the spiritual, and all at the same time. The David Copperfield created by Second Cause has an embodiment in the psychical, and probably in that only. But it is as real embodiment as that of man the mortal, and reached in precisely the same manner, that is by Thought Creation.

Ego's own immortality is founded on the fact that his individuality is expressed in certain vibrations of the ether; and when those vibrations are repeated everything that has been, and will be, becomes a present reality. The existence of man's created man depends on the same law. Now let us, very briefly, see what this means, for the student and I are traversing a forest wilderness of the unexplored, at least by man the mortal.

However real they may be, Robinson Crusoe and Bunyan's Pilgrim never had a form existence in earth life. They were "thought realities" as much as the bridge or the temple is a thought reality before it is outlined with pen and pencil into vibrations wherein it may be seen and touched by mortal sense. Their existence is just as real and prolonged as that of Ego himself—on the psychic plane. If the reader will think for a moment of, say, both Charles Dickens and David Copperfield he will perceive that, to him, one is precisely as real as the other; and that either and both are as real as any other character depicted in human history. Our acquaintance with anyone is a mere matter of detail. In fact most of us know far less of Dickens than of Copperfield. Each exists to-day amid certain vibrations whose repetition in mortal experience we call "memory." Every historical character is nothing but a name, save as he has been, and is created in detail by the historian. Socrates lives amid vibrations where he has been placed by Plato; and both Plato and Socrates are no more real to us to-day than David Copperfield. If one can be invoked or evoked by the mortal so can the other. The life in all alike is "Created Individuality." That one is created by First Cause, and the other by Second Cause is only a difference of degree. God Senior and God Junior use the same methods, and the same raw materials. We have here to remember that there are thought perfections and thought imperfections as much in men as in bridges, but the imperfect and the perfect are alike expressions of life in certain vibrations of ether, where thought holds direct control.

So we have at this moment a Dickens created by God Senior, and a Copperfield created by God Junior, equally alive, and each in his degree. Each is an entity. Each may therefore be reached by intention or chance (if there be chance) and each is included in the phenomena called "spirit return." The difference is this. God-made Ego has a manifestation amid vibrations which appeal to mortal sense. Should such vibrations cease for any cause whatever Ego remains still an entity, manifesting amid vibrations we call "spirit." And we may well believe that if, in some distant future, those spirit vibrations should in their turn cease to respond to manhood, yet Ego will only be advancing into greater powers, and a more godly individuality.

But man's-created man is an entity within certain limits only. Real, absolutely real, amid his own vibrations, he remains both embodied and limited. Ego cannot endow his creations with his own soul life any more than Deity could endow Ego with an infinite godhood. So the student will now see that just as we have God Senior and God Junior, we have also man senior and man junior as facts in creation. This man junior is alive, and with manly power shaping his own surroundings; and being very near to mortal vibrations he is undoubtedly one of the chief factors in "spirit return." The element of progress we call "soul growth" would be unknown to him, but his ethics would be shaped by social considerations as with us mortals.

We further notice that David Copperfield, as a creation of Dickens, is no more and no less certain an entity than his created Fagin the Jew, thief, or Bill Sykes the murderer. His benevolent old Fezziwigs is no more or less of an entity than the infamous Ralph Nickleby who would sell his own niece. And each of these man-created men is alive, and ever responsive to his own vibrations. But all the same, we mark an awful difference between Ego and his creations. God Senior's men learn by experience, and grow into a nobler manhood. The creations of God Junior are always the same, with no more of progress than is infused into them by their creator. Copperfield will be Copperfield to the end of time, and Bill Sykes will murder so long as vibrations permit. Such is the natural law amid which God Senior and God Junior must both work. But this truth contains a marked lesson for the student and me.

Amid the vibrations in which the Spiritualist seeks to demonstrate and enjoy "spirit return" man-created man is specially at home. Now let us endeavor to discover what that means. We immediately discover that the novelist, and the dramatist and the historian are not the only creators of this limited manhood, but that the reader and I are also building living entities, who, in their turn, influence and sometimes control their creators. We further notice there is both a dark and a bright side to this creative power, for if it inhere to Ego through his divine origin, it cannot be limited to his lower personality we call man-mortal. Man-spirit must have a similar power, though limited to the vibrations amid which he lives and moves. And beyond man-spirit is Ego himself as a vast and united though limited whole, who by the exercise of precisely the same Creative Power is, in his turn, giving birth to idealized Egos who cannot transcend the vibrations into which they are born.

I will now ask the student to turn back to our starting point that he may mark, and map if he will, the position we have reached in our exploration of this land of the unknown. We started with the assertion that man can only realize the personified. Infinite Intelligence is beyond his grasp. Yet when that Infinite Intelligence is limited into personification he recognizes it and calls it "Ego." We perceive that Limited Intelligence retains the essentials of the Unlimited. I might have spoken of them as Intelligence Senior and Intelligence Junior, but deeming the reader would better grasp the thought under a more accustomed name, I have called the Infinite All in All "God Senior;" and his finited manifestations I have called "God Junior." The lesser retains all the finite possibilities of his creator. His limited selfhood is, however, so vast that to any intelligence less than his own he breaks into separate personalities, only one of which can be grasped at a time. So we have Ego as man the mortal; man the spirit; and, mayhap, man the angel, but all included in man Ego.

The expression of thought which crystallizes into form, being an essence of intelligence, inheres to Ego, and therefore, but in a lesser degree, inheres to each of his personifications. We must further keep in mind that these personifications are all active at the same time, and just as lasting as the vibrations of the ether in which they personify. So we have, to use every-day language, a sort of family chart which stands as God-Senior the Great Thinker, only known to us through Ego, who is his expressed thought, and with similar, but limited powers to those of his Creator. We then perceive Ego as God-Junior, in his turn flashing out other Thought Creations, necessarily limited to definite expression in ethereal vibrations. The Chart further exhibits these Thought Creations by Ego as also embodied intelligences, and each exercising its power on a yet more limited scale. But these Creations by Ego are expressed in each of his personalities. This gives to Man-spirit, and perchance to Man-angel, the same power, or perhaps the compulsion, to express his own Ideality into a limited but form life.

The student can now perceive that the unknown land we are exploring is peopled, first of all, with Egos, who are limited expressions of the Infinite. The personalities of Ego are divided only by vibratory limits, at which border line they can more or less mingle, blend, and exchange some of their experiences. But the population also enrolls vast peoples born of Ego's Creative Thoughts with each individual limited by the vibrations into which he is born, and through which he experiences life. And the student notices, yet further, that these lesser Creations have their share also of inherited power, and create their own thoughts into lesser forms of life.

As a result of our own exploration we now discover that Creation is not the simple matter expressed by Theological ignorance as a six day's work by a personified Deity. Nor can it be measured by modern rule of evolution into scientific feet and inches. So it is time for the independent thinker to cast aside forever such absurd limitations.

The effect of the outworking of these laws upon mortal man remains to be most carefully studied. Man the mortal has climbed but slowly even to a knowledge of his own immortality. Everything beyond that has seemed delightfully simple. His loved one dies, and comes back through a medium. Such has been Modern Spiritualism. The student will begin to see that the unexplored is vaster than he has dreamed, and is offering problems worthy of his utmost powers. He will begin to realize that the historian has himself been a Thought Creator, and has peopled the past with living entities, who have been idealized, and some of them worshiped as if they were real Egos exemplifying a Divine sonship. Herein is the gateway into further fields of thought.

Meantime the student and I will do well to go over and over this discovered territory, and thus claim it for our very own. We will then be ready to once again explore the unknown of human powers and possibilities.

San Leandro, Cal.

THE STUDIO GHOST.

A Most Remarkable Experience.

This is how it happened.

I had some occasion to spend some weeks in Belgium, and I settled myself for the time at Bruges, where I was engaged on some architectural drawings. There I rented as a studio, an old room which had long been unoccupied, but which had been used some years before for the same purpose by two artist friends, whose names and work were unknown to the present owner. The use of sundry articles of venerable furniture was included in the rent. These were two oak tables, massive and still sound; four or five high backed chairs, worm eaten and decrepit, and pitted, as if with the smallpox of old age, whose legs were becoming estranged from the framework, and which straddled at uncertain angles when one sat upon them; some bits of faded tapestry that had been a restaurant for a colony of moths; a rug or two on the floor, trodden into a network of colorless strings; and a number of disjointed stretchers, piled in one corner for the convenience of the local spider. In fact, the whole place looked as if it had been furnished from a broker's shop kept by old Father Time.

Besides these things there was a curious, antique massive iron chest, padlocked on each of two broad bands, and scarred here and there by spots of rust. There stood the chest, but of the keys I could get no information beyond a shrug of the shoulders. The room was large, the rent suited me and there I set up my easel. No doubt it was melancholy, but, taking it altogether, it suited monsieur, as I was told, to a marvel.

By day I was employed for the most part out of doors; but after dark, and often till a late hour, I was bending over my drawing board, working with pen and ink, and dressing the photograph that supplemented my morning's sketch so conveniently. There I sat in an oasis of light thrown down by my shaded lamp, with a desert of mystery before me.

I am not a nervous person. My hand is steady after uncounted cigarettes. But when all was still, this studio was uncanny. The table at which I sat (if I could believe the tales I have read and heard) might rap out some strange secrets of disembodied burgomasters. What plots might there not have been hatched round it! What evidence of usury might there not lurk in that crazy drawer, that seemed ashamed to shut. And that iron chest! was it full of miser's gold? and, if so, did my tenancy include any interest in its contents? Who were the former tenants? and were they better men than I? Such idle speculations kept chasing each other about my brain, as I peered into the darkness, in the intervals of my work, and rolled a fresh cigarette. Sometimes a ghostly crack would sound in the paneling; or the lamp would sputter; or a little cloud of smoke from the end of my last cigarette, thrown aside on a saucer, would rise into the lamp light and, as I caught its haze against the blackness beyond with the corner of my eye, appear to assume some shape, which made me creepy for the instant. But I am not nervous. I say that emphatically. And I went on with my work till I was tired, and strolled out through the sleepy streets before I turned for the night. So I worked for three successive evenings.

On the fourth evening I lighted my lamp as usual, and commenced a new drawing, curiously enough of an interior which bore a strong resemblance to the studio in which I was working. There were the high-backed chairs, and a muniment chest, and the paneled walls, very similar to those in the darkness around me. I had worked perhaps an hour and a half, and had laid down my pen for a moment to study, from the photograph, more closely the details of the carving on the chest, when I was prompted by some influence, apart from my own volition, to look up. As I raised my eyes they became fixed, and I felt as if my heart had stopped beating. From the ironbound chest, the outline of which was but dimly visible against the wall to my right hand, a figure seemed to grow from an impalpable haze into a definite shape—a figure with all the apparent modeling and solidity of life, yet, in some indescribable way, but the gaseous presentiment of a man; a presence rather than a reality; a form at once palpable and ethereal, noiseless in the dead stillness, treading, without sound, and looking at me with sad eyes! I could see the face, a worn, suffering face, clearly. Every detail of dress, that of some twenty years back, was perfectly defined, for the presence seemed to have a light inherent in itself sufficient to give an impression of color without insisting on it, as if a moonbeam had been molded into man. I could not have moved a muscle to save my life. A great throb came surging through my brain and kept my eyes fixed, staring, without even the power of thought. I sat spellbound, petrified.

The figure, after one long look at me, moved towards my easel, and, standing before it, raised its right arm as if to finger the brushes lying on the ledge. The right arm was without a hand; It was horrible to see the mutilated stump fumbling among the brushes, as if with a feverish desire to use them, striving, in its blunted impotence, to lift them, and rattling them without a sound! I had no idea how long this lasted. I lost all sense of time. But as I looked the presence faded into nothingness, and the space before me was once more all mystery.

I had no derangement of my liver—I had not been dreaming—and my brain was in a normal condition. I had certainly seen a ghost; I had smudged the wet ink on the drawing with my elbow, and I worked no more that night.

In the morning I was glad, I must confess, of the companionship of sunlight in my studio. There was some story here, if I could only fathom it. But how? The ghostly visitor was no doubt an artist—possibly one of the two who formerly had shared the studio. But the missing hand? The figure had made no attempt to use the left hand, consequently he must have lost his right hand when in the full exercise of his power; for the desire to use it remained, though the instrument of his will was gone. Then the figure had seemed at first an animation from the iron chest. Could the clew to this mystery be locked up with it? I could see no reason for such a conclusion; but the more I pondered on this, the strangest incident of my life, the more determined I became to see the inside of that chest. I would bargain with the owner and buy the chest, if possible, and then I should be at liberty to break it open, if necessary, and satisfy myself.

The owner had no objection. If monsieur the artist was of that mind, be it so. The chest was of no great antiquity; but, parbleu! as a baggage, it was by several kilos in excess, is it not? As for the contents, monsieur need not make himself the trouble to open. One has turned it on end, and one has heard nothing to the inside, savez vous? but monsieur is artiste and such subjects go well to the atelier.

So for the consideration of a few francs the chest became my property. I wasted half that day in buying up all the old keys I thought likely to fit; but I found none, and determined to force the padlocks. "Did my landlord know of a blacksmith who would come?" But, yes! the fiance of his daughter—a workman of the best. Unhappily to-day he makes holiday; but to-morrow, Monsieur Artiste, he shall come before breakfast.

There was nothing for it but to wait, and I worked that night as usual without any reappearance of the ghost. I did not indeed work so long as on previous evenings, for my nerves were much shaken, and I looked up every moment expecting to see the presence which was not there. The striking of a match almost frightened me in the dead quiet. In fact, I did nothing but keep my courage screwed up till the lamp showed signs of going out, and this gave me a welcome excuse for ending my sitting.

The blacksmith came early, as had been promised, and in a few minutes the padlocks were off, and the two front hasps loosened from the staples. I dismissed the workmen hurriedly and locked the studio door. At last the clew to the mystery was in my grasp; and yet I paused, from the very force of my excited curiosity. One moment only—then I lifted the iron bands, and threw back the heavy lid.

I had been told that the chest was empty. What did I find? A head-size canvas, face downwards, sloped against one side of the chest. I lifted this out, and with nervous fingers felt along the inner corners. There was dust, and nothing more. But as I knelt to my search I noticed a stain on the edge of the chest, and from this patch a rivulet of similar stain had trickled down the inner side. A stain! Blood! My imagination overexcited as it was, rushed to this conviction. The ghostly visitor was maimed! There was some mysterious connection between that figure and the iron chest, and here was a blood stain! But I had not yet looked at the canvas. After wiping it carefully, I set it on my easel, and stood before it to examine what evidence the painting might have to give. Was it the work of the artist's ghost. I determined that it must be. I looked long and earnestly at the painting. Technically it put my own work to shame; and here had this canvas been lying for years, unseen! The head of a man in middle life of finely molded features, but with a sinister expression—a face one could not forget. In it I could read a complex indication of evil passions—a portrait, evidently. It was unfinished, and the evidence it offered, was absolutely negative. Two artists had once shared this studio; I had seen a vision of the one; could this be a portrait of the other?

Such speculation I turned over in my mind all day, hesitating between reasonable doubt and doubtful certainty, in my endeavor to make awkward improbabilities fit into the spare corners of act.

But time being an object with me, I continued my regular work by lamplight, with the idea that the spectral artist would visit me no more. I argued this from the fact that I had seen nothing on the previous evening and the possession of the hidden picture somehow confirmed my thought, so that I worked on with my mind concentrated on firmness of line and blackness of ink, haunted only by a recollection of what had been. Although thus technically absorbed, at last I did look up into the gloom. Once more there was the figure, palpable, motionless, its head bowed down before the canvas on the easel. It had not grown, from haze into life life form, as on the occasion of the first vision. It was there; and, whilst I looked it was not.

Clearly, then, I was right in supposing that this canvas was intimately connected with the unsolved mystery. But how? I asked myself this question with a reiteration that hypnotized my reason; but the riddle was beyond my finding out. For seven successive evenings I worked on and I saw the vision no more.

And during these days a controlling desire possessed me to paint a picture in which the ghostly figure and the face on the canvas should be associated in a composition wherein the iron chest and the studio should be included. I walked about with this idea—I dreamed about it—until it took definite shape, and finally grew under my hands to a completed picture. I felt urged to this new work by an intelligence beyond and outside of myself, assuring me of an ultimate success to which I was not accustomed. I, whose previous technical convictions made me almost a habitual criminal in pigments. I, who had libelled gods and goddesses so cruelly that Jupiter Tonans, unless he had run short of thunderbolts, must have struck me color-blind. Yet now I had painted this scene, this old studio, exactly as it was. A figure whose face was turned away, but whose form was that of the spectre, knelt, writhing in agony, whilst his right hand was crushed under the heavy lid of an iron chest; and a second figure, whose face was the counterpart of that on the mysterious canvas, with a sneer of fiendish triumph, was peeping down the torturing metal. I dressed my models after the more picturesque period of the seventeenth century, but otherwise I painted exactly what I had seen and what I saw. Title, "The Rat Trap," which left the motif of the picture as much a riddle to the public as to myself.

In six weeks' time I left Bruges. I saw the ghost no more. The unknown portrait occupies the place of honor in my dining-room and my own picture was hung on the line at the Royal academy.

And here another strange thing happened.

One July afternoon of the same season I happened to be at the exhibition with some country cousins, for whose benefit I was doing showman. We chanced to be in the gallery in which my picture was hung, but we had just entered it by the door at the opposite end. My young cousin Clara, was hurrying in full cry for my picture towards which I was being dragged; there was a sudden commotion in the crowd, and it was said that some old gentleman had fallen down in a fit. He, however, was cared for and removed before we had worked my way round to my picture, and we thought little more of the matter, my young cousins fussing about like torpedo boats with the Channel fleet, and my Aunt Susan dying for her cup of tea.

The next morning, however, I was startled by an early visit from an eminent physician, requesting me to call at once at a certain address on a patient of his, who had been struck down in a fit on the previous afternoon at the Royal academy.

"Why send for me," I asked in my surprise.

"That I cannot say," was the reply. "I only know that my patient, as soon as he regained consciousness, insisted that I should call on the artist who painted No. 627 in the catalogue, "The Rat Trap." A very powerful picture, my dear sir. But there is every reason for your making haste. The poor gentleman cannot live many hours."

So the mystery of the studio at Bruges still hung about my picture! I jumped into a hansom, and within half an hour I arrived at the address given.

I was shown up stairs at once into the room where the dying man lay. Great God! his face was that of the portrait from which I had copied the features of the villain in my picture—changed by the lapse of years, distorted by illness—but unmistakably the same in feature and expression, although the shadow of death had fallen upon it!

I staggered as I looked.

With an impatient gesture he motioned the nurse aside, and clutching at me, asked in a hoarse whisper, "Who told you?"

I remained speechless. He continued, jerking out spasmodically his broken memories of the past: "Are you angel or devil that you saw me crush his hand in the iron chest? * * he died * * in the hospital * * * and I was glad * * * I hated him * * we worked together * * he was a genius * * and I failed * * * men praised him * * they slighted me * * * I swore he should do no more work * * * I seized my opportunity * * * when he was kneeling at that chest, and I crushed him * * * so! * * * We were alone* * * alone * * * but you saw it * * * you!"

His energy was terrible. It was delirium, yet truth. "Did he tell you * * * he is dead * * * I hid the accursed painting * * * it was my portrait* * * in the chest * * * * the keys are down in the deep, deep sea * * * No one knows * * * only you * * * only you!"

He spoke no more: and his last words were set down to delirium. Requiescat!

Woman, Church and State.

A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages, with Reminiscences of the Matriarchate.

BY MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

THE AMOUNT OF VALUABLE INformation succinctly and clearly stated in this volume of 564 pages is amazing. The title, as above given, fails to convey an idea of the fulness and completeness with which the subjects are treated. The Matriarchate, or Mother-rule, is the theme of the first chapter, in which much lore, quaint, queer and curious, is brought to view in elucidation of the subject. This is followed by chapters on Celibacy, Canon Law, Marquette, Witchcraft, Wives, Polygamy, Woman and Work, The Church of To-day, Past, Present, Future; and there is not a chapter in the book that is not handled in a masterly manner, and that for quantity and quality of information, is not worth the full price of the volume. It is packed with knowledge well-arranged, and intensely interesting from beginning to end. No one can possibly regret buying it; it is a valuable addition to the library of any free and truth-loving mind.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the arts."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in children's lyceums. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. It is a most excellent book and should be widely circulated.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. - - - - Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1900.

The Missionary.

For almost a century the American churches have put forth strenuous efforts to convert the heathen of foreign lands. Ever since the lamented Adoniram Judson and his devoted wife sacrificed themselves in India, the Hindu has been the especial care of the Missionary boards. The antiquity of the civilization of Hindustan; its splendid literature; its claims to occult wisdom, the similarity of the race in their remote relationship of the great Aryan family, made their conversion to Christianity worthy of the effort. In order to gain sympathy, and thus contributions of funds, the Hindus were represented as grossest idolators, who threw themselves in front of the wheels of the Juggernaut, burned widows at the funeral of their husbands, and cast their children to the crocodiles of the Ganges.

More truthful and less bigoted information has slowly been received, and especially in the comparison of religions made at the Columbian Exposition's Religious Congress, has made evident the fact that if missionaries are to go forth they should come from India to this country.

This was forcibly shown the other day in a lecture made by Bipin Chandra Pal, the noted Hindu preacher, before a Boston audience.

"I have lived in England," he said, "and I have traveled in America, and I have never, while in Picadilly or Chicago, regretted that I was a heathen. The Christian people are practiced in grabbing other people's land, but we are practical in matters of the spirit. We teach kindness by example. When a beggar comes to ask for food we do not call for a policeman and have that beggar put in jail. And how do we teach kindness to animals? We teach the little children to give the crumbs to the ravens, or whatever birds are about, and before eating it used to be the custom to carry out a morsel of food to the birds, and the man would not eat until the birds had eaten. That was not idolatry, but all that was before we were civilized. Another heathen custom is that for a man always before eating to go into the street and ask: 'Are there any who are in need?' that he might share his repast with another. And the man who was poor would accost the man who was rich: 'Trustee of God's wealth, give me something.'"

The sting in his words is that they are true and no one can deny them. The Hindu people have evolved and continue to maintain a purer and more spiritual religion. Christian missionaries can teach them nothing in this direction. They have the original, and at its source. The intense selfishness, the grasping avarice in business, the remorseless crushing of the weak by the strong, the devotion of knowledge to the oppression of the less informed, of the western people, have no place in the system of morality of the heathen of the Orient, and Christian preachers must stand abashed in the presence of the noble and unselfish representatives of Indian thought.

The Jew on Missionaries.

"The Jewish Exponent," a leading Hebrew paper, referring to Christian missions in a late issue, discoursed thusly:

"The missionary spirit is essentially militant [warlike]. It is engaged in spiritual conquests, and its aim is victory over its foes. In its methods it partakes of the character of a warlike enterprise. Nay, it not infrequently happens that it encourages actual warfare in order to secure its purposes. The church militant marches shoulder to shoulder with imperialism in the state and in the name of religion and civilization imposes its sway upon subject nations.

"He that preacheth peace cannot hope to thrive by the sword. Liberty and the rights of man cannot be secured to distant nations by conquest and subjugation. The triumph of truth cannot be gained by weapons of violence or unrighteous intrigue.

"What evils the missionary spirit is capable of producing are testified to by the Crusades, the massacres of Jews, and the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition during the Middle Ages. It is shown in the persecution of the Jews in Russia to-day, and in the unscrupulous devices employed against Jews everywhere where Christianity comes in contact with it."

Sensible Action.

At the Methodist General Conference, on May 23, by a vote of 433 to 238, the five year limit which a preacher was allowed to remain in charge of one church, was abolished. Hereafter the Bishop can allow a pastor to remain in one place so long as he pleases.

Since Methodist preachers have become an educated body, the reasons for requiring them to "move on" no longer exist.

Hope in Every Direction.

There has been no period in any previous age when there was a greater inclination to know the truth in regard to religious matters than the present. The early history of prevailing opinions, with their rise and progress, are everywhere read with avidity. At the same time there is a readiness to reject teachings resting on insufficient evidence, and an inclination to reconstruct thought along the lines of real knowledge that was never known before.

All the great schools of learning came under the management of sectarians, and they have been used to build up and strengthen the ancient faith. All research into the past has been in the interest of church dogmas. As soon as a professor gave evidence of discoveries inconsistent with the popular creeds, his chair was vacated, else a successor less independent occupied his place, and past error was purposely perpetuated.

Life has hardly been worth living unless one believed with the masses. The priest hurled his venom from the pulpit, and a subsidized press echoed his vituperation, while political demagogues, ambitious to rule, stooped to any measures that promised a vote in his interest.

It is absolutely wonderful to see how all at once this condition of things has changed. The shackles which enslaved thought have been broken, and for the first time since Roman authority tolerated all religions, or no religion, men are free again. We see it all around us, everywhere. Almost every public journal taken up has one or more articles breathing the spirit of freedom. Scholars are undaunted, and very generally are beginning to express their views without fear or favor.

Take Prof. F. S. Hoffman's late article on Prof. St. George Mivart, in the North American Review: The Doctor occupies the chair of Philosophy in Union College. He had the courage to say in that article that it was purely a matter of historical evidence whether such a person as Jesus ever existed, and the same as to what he experienced.

If a matter of evidence, as it certainly is, then that evidence will fall with different force on different persons, convincing to some, and repelled by others as not sufficient to establish the points claimed. Each person is a juror to decide for himself, after he has examined all sides. We were forcibly impressed by Prof. Hoffman's assurance that—

"We can never be absolutely certain that those who wrote Jesus' history were really acquainted with the facts of his life, or have honestly represented them, or that their testimony, after being once recorded, has not been so frequently and radically altered as to give us to-day, in some respects, an erroneous conception of the truth. Even if we regard the record as it stands veritable history, the doctrine of the actual divinity of Jesus, that he is in reality Son of God as well as Son of Man, is an induction from certain alleged facts, and can, therefore, never be established beyond all possible doubt."

Prof. Hoffman concludes in a very different strain from the average churchman. He says:

"We ask every student of theology to take up the subject precisely as he would any other; that he begin with doubt, and carefully weigh the arguments for every doctrine, accepting and rejecting each assertion according as the balance of probabilities is for or against it. We demand that he thoroughly 'test all things,' and thus learn how to 'hold fast that which is good.' We believe even the teachings of Jesus should be viewed from this standpoint, and should be accepted or rejected on the ground of their inherent reasonableness. * * The one pre-eminent demand of the present hour is a truly scientific theology—not a Chinese, nor a Roman, nor an Anglican theology; not a Baptist, nor a Methodist, nor a Presbyterian theology; not a Mosaic, nor exclusively a Pauline theology, but a theology so cautiously constructed as to exclude all fiction, and so profound and comprehensive in its teachings as to include all the facts."

That will do. Let us have all the facts and reconstruct our faith on those facts, eliminating fable. Hebrew, Pagan and Christian, then build anew, guided only by truth, and we shall have a religion whose end and purpose will be, to be good and to do good.

They All Languish.

Reports from every quarter, and along every line of church enterprise, agree in showing a decline in church progress. At the 112th General Assembly of Presbyterians, still in session at St. Louis as we write, a report was made regarding disabled ministers. Rev. Louis H. Severance, of Cleveland, in presenting that report, said:

"The contributions of the churches have neither kept pace with the advance of the churches, nor with the advance of the roll of annuitants."

Rev. S. then went on to say, $25,000 more money was absolutely needed this year than was paid last year, to make the appropriations required by the various Presbyteries.

Though politicians are boasting of unparalleled prosperous times, and point to dividends of millions among the associates of Carnigie and Rockefeller,—the latter having given $7,000,000 to the Chicago University, where clergymen are manufactured by the wholesale, as a sort of sin-offering,—and every ward heeler is echoing the claim, yet it is probable there is not a Christian church in America, of any denomination, that is not languishing for want of contributions from lay members, who have listened so long to the false cry of "Wolf! wolf!!" in the shape of hell, or purgatorial fires, that they have become convinced there are no such fires.

An Eye on the Coin.

"Beggars should not be choosers," says a time-honored maxim; but Rev. Father O'Hara, of Flushing, N. Y., draws a line between pennies and dimes, and wants the latter. He said in his pulpit the other Sunday:

"Last week I counted 2,600 pennies. Those who are in the habit of contributing pennies had better save them for weighing machines and chewing gum stands and not deposit them in the collection plate. Pennies are children's money, and are not for adults. In the future I would rather count nickels and dimes."

In any other than a Catholic church there would be a rebellion, and even pennies would be withheld. They who give should be permitted to give what they please, and they who receive should be grateful for small favors; but those who are posing as the disciples and apostles of Jesus are not content to follow his directions to "Take no thought for the morrow," so they threaten with purgatorial fires those whose finances are limited to the possession of small coin only.

The Paleontologist.

Dr. J. C. Merriam, at the head of a paleontological expedition, sent out by the University of California, to the canyon of John Day River, in Oregon, has made some highly interesting discoveries for the scientist. The expedition found the fossil bones of numerous uncouth animals which have been long extinct, many millions of years doubtless intervening since they were in full life. Among these was the skull and vertebrae of a huge monster of the swine family, known to geologists as the elotherium. They were the remains of an animal 12 feet in length, weighing in its prime, says the report, as much as a prize Durham bull. Its formidable tusks and teeth showed it was an enlarged edition of the wild boar of modern times, subsisting on both vegetable and animal food. Says the San Francisco Chronicle, in detailing the discovery:

"The animals must have flourished in antiquity far remote. Their bones were found imbedded in ash and volcanic tufa 1,500 feet thick. Over these beds 3,000 feet of lava has been poured in many successive eruptions, with no one knows how many thousands of years between. Above the lava is 6,000 feet of sediment, the only remains of a long dried lake, and above this lake bed are still more layers of tufa and of lava. The river has cut through the lava and the fossil beds, exposing many deposits of great wealth to the scientist.

"Dr. J. C. Merriam carefully inspected the face of the cliffs and with pickax and chisel cut out the crumbling fragments of bone. The net results of the expedition were very valuable. In addition to the skulls and vertebrae of the elotherium there were found the bones and teeth of mastodons, of an extinct wolf, an ancient deerlike creature, the three-toed horse, and of many other species long since extinct. In many cases a block of stone containing the remains was cut out and brought away, leaving the work of freeing the bones to be done with mallet and chisel in the laboratories at Berkeley."

Think of it, ye who cling to an inerrant Bible, with less than 6,000 years since creation! More than two miles in depth of tufa—a species of sandstone—ashes, lava and sediment were superposed above those ancient remains of organic life, more than a mile of which was sediment deposited in an ocean which had rolled over that region after the animals were imbedded in volcanic ashes, resembling in this regard the burial of Pompeii. The Chronicle, whose editor evidently is not a geologist, supposes the sedimentary deposits were laid down in a lake, but in this he errs. Above this sediment was 3,000 feet in thickness of lava, representing numerous volcanic eruptions. Above all this were 6,000 feet of sand and gravel denoting a second submergence—with probably many millions of years intervening, during which the sedimentary deposit was rolled along the bed of an angry ocean. Then another emergence marked by tufa and lava. These of themselves indicate millions of years.

But, look again: Rain fell from the clouds. It formed streamlets. These increased in size and number until they formed a mighty river. That river by attrition wore away the lava and tufa. It cut its way down through 6,000 feet of sand and gravel, intermingled with boulders. Millions and millions of years went by, and on flowed that now known as John Day River canyon. It cut away that flint-like lava, and down through ashes and tufa and sedimentary rock, leaving a wall on either bank two miles high. And here, at the very base, encased in rock, were found these fossils, themselves but mineral rock, so enduring as the globe itself.

Tell these things to an antediluvian mossback preacher who has come down from a former generation, and we are met with the fool remark:

"God made these fossils to deceive and confound the wise."

And the average churchman is content with the answer of the pulpiteer, who was made wise by his ordination; for by that act he was made a vicegerent of God on earth, and capable of fathoming Infinite Wisdom, and communicating his most secret counsels to man for his guidance.

Wants No Hell In His Creed.

The Wauseon, Ohio, Republican, in a recent issue, publishes a letter from Rev. A. M. Rihbany, of Morenci, Mich., wherein he explains his new position on religious questions. He does not tell us of the sect he left, but he does say:

"I do not believe God ever created a hell for any one. Sin is its own hell. It would be impossible for me to enjoy heaven if I knew the meanest sinner was burning in eternal sulphurous flames." And of Jesus Rev. R. says: "He was born just as any other man, and the story regarding his miraculous birth is to me a superstition. His death has nothing to do with our sins."

Rev. R. says he was born but a score of miles from where Jesus was born, and he claims he can easily see how so many superstitions crept into the Bible.

If our Brother will familiarize himself with Roman and Grecian mythology, and see how the Pagan gods had sons by mortal women, not one but scores of them; how some of these lesser gods suffered for the good of man; and next, when he finds the Christian hell is identical with the Pagan hades; and if he shall dip down still deeper he will learn that the New Testament was originally written in Latin, probably in Rome or its environs, and afterwards translated into very impure Greek; then his love for that Bible will vanish with the fables he has already surrendered.

We congratulate our Brother for his escape from the grossest inconsistencies of Christianity, and wish he would turn his attention to Spiritualism and become familiar with its teachings. It is the creedless religion of the future, with freedom for a wide range of thought.

A Distressing Fact.

A lady visitor from a neighboring town chanced to meet a few days ago on a street car in Chicago a clerical acquaintance of former years. After the usual inquiries and answers about family affairs the man of God said he was greatly distressed because of the innate wickedness of his grandson, and he was at a terrible loss to know how to act in the premises. He went on to say:

"Last night when Tommy said his prayers he asked God to bless everybody, mentioning those he knew by name, and protracting his petition to great length. Having finished his task with Amen, the boy was silent for a few moments, when he suddenly sprang up with—

"'Gee whiz! What will God think? I forgot to ask him to bless Grandma.'

"Such irreverence at so early an age," said the dominie, "betokens a very wicked mind, and I am greatly distressed for the future of the poor boy!"

All Prodigies Are Simply Mediums.

It appears from the Pittsburg (Pa.) Leader that lovers of music in Pittsburg will soon have an opportunity to see and hear two of the most remarkable juvenile prodigies of the art divine in this section of the country. Prof. K. T. W. Guenther, of the Greater Pittsburg Band, is about to bring out these two youthful musicians in public at one of the concerts to be given by his organization this summer. The place of the concert is not yet determined, but the date will not be more than thirty days off. The youngsters are Miss Annie G. Saddler, aged 11, and Master George Schaffnit, aged 10 years, of Knoxville and Allegheny City respectively. Annie is a pianist of extraordinary talent, and Master Schaffnit is a veritable wonder on the piccolo. The two will play together, and also in conjunction with the band. Of the boy musician nothing has heretofore appeared in print so far, but Annie's gifts and mastery of the piano have been exploited in the Sunday Leader, the first paper in Pittsburg, by the way, to discover the little genius.

Prof. Guenther is extremely proud of the pair, as they are both pupils of his. He is business manager for the girl, who is in great demand at concerts and other music recitals. She is very ambitious to rise to the top of her profession, and is making advances there with rapid strides. Besides showing wonderful ability to make the ivory keys talk, she is a composer of skill, considering her immature age. She recently wrote a composition which she has named "White House March and Two-Step," dedicated to President McKinley. The second copy struck off was sent to the chief executive, the first, of course, being required to be deposited with the copyright bureau of the patent office. The President, through his private secretary, Mr. Cortelyou, sent the little composer a letter signed by himself, thanking her for the honor thus conferred on him and complimenting her for the tunefulness and rhythm of the selection. Annie is immensely proud of this autograph letter. Besides the two-step she has turned out several other pieces, including waltzes and marches. She is a daughter of James G. Saddler, engineer in chief of the Marine National Bank Building on Smithfield street. From earliest years she evinced a decided talent for music and of the standard variety. Her repertoire now includes such difficult classical selections as Beethoven's sonatas, Mascagni, Wagner, Liszt, Weber, Verdi and other great composers. Of course, her range and expression are not equal to the great professional pianists. As yet her hands are not large enough to allow of her mastering a certain class of pianoforte compositions, but this will be possible in a few years. She loved to thrum on the keys even when a little tot of 3 or 4 years, and astonished her elders with her knowledge of time and harmony. She could remember airs she had heard, and would come home and with great skill and patience for one of her years pick out the tune on the piano, making the majors and minors with surprising correctness. Later she began taking lessons, and made rapid progress. Her talent made her in great demand at children's parties and other kinds of socials, and later at public concerts. During the last three years or more she has performed in public in nearly all the counties in the western part of Pennsylvania, and has received repeated encores, at times the audience rising to its feet and rushing en masse to the stage and carrying her around the house on their arms. She is a particularly pretty and winsome child, and this, with her graceful playing, generally makes a combination that the emotional part of an audience cannot resist. She has had several offers from instructors and managers of theatrical and concert companies to go on the stage or platform, but her parents have always refused on account of her age and the severance of school duties that such a course would necessarily involve. These offerings have been very flattering, as they carried with them substantial financial considerations. In spite of all the adulation and flattery bestowed on her, Annie is as modest as a young country miss without knowledge of the plaudits of the multitude or of the ways of the fickle world. There is nothing in her manner that would indicate that she thought herself in any way different from the rest of little girls. Her services were wanted at the last choir recital and concert of the Ringwalt Choir Union in Carnegie Hall, but for reasons deemed sufficient by her manager Annie was not allowed to participate. There has been a desire on the part of the musical public to hear the diminutive pianiste in the great auditorium, but her father is going slow on her appearing in great public places and it may be some time yet before she appears there.

Annie has played in private before John Philip Sousa, the great band leader, who is now in Paris giving daily concerts at the Exposition, his organization being the official band of the United States Government there. Sousa speaks highly of the little Pittsburger, and has sent her several of his marches bearing his autograph. She includes his stirring compositions in her repertoire. Every year he comes to the local Exposition she goes to meet him and plays on the piano in the room fitted up for the band or orchestra leaders there.

The other youthful prodigy, George Schaffnit, is well known in Allegheny City, where he plays in a boys' orchestra and has appeared at numerous school recitals and concerts. He has not yet been heard in Pittsburg as far as public concerts go. He is a son of Harry Schaffnit, an electrician, of 821 Jackson street. His mastery of the piccolo is extraordinary.

These two prodigies are undoubtedly musical mediums, like Blind Tom and many others. There is no other way to account for their extraordinary musical ability.

Paul Repudiated.

The Methodist General Conference, in session in Chicago, May 22, by an almost unanimous vote, amended their constitution by striking out the word "layman" and substituting "lay member," it being the object hereafter to allow the sisters seats in that body as delegates, privileges heretofore denied them.

Save among non-evangelicals, during the whole period the church has been an organized body, women have been treated as ciphers, without voice or vote, the question whether they had souls to save or lose being mooted in their Councils. Now Paul, with his instructions to the sisters to learn at home of their husbands, is relegated to an obscure seat, and woman comes to the front, thanks to the kindly influence of Infidels and Spiritualists, who have lost no opportunity in exposing the wrongs done by the churches to the better half of our race.

A Prophetic Dream.

It appears from the St. Louis Republic, that on one Sunday morning lately, at the breakfast table Otto Schaubert, the 18-year-old son of George Schaubert, of Mascoutah, Ill., said that he had dreamed that he had lain in a pool of blood. A few hours later, while attending church services, his father's mind was vividly recalled to the strange dream of his son. About that time the young man was bleeding to death slowly from a ghastly gunshot wound inflicted accidentally while climbing a fence.

Coroner Schildroth held the inquest yesterday morning and a verdict was returned of accidental death. The case attracted great attention in the village of Mascoutah.

Otto laughed at the dream as he told it, and considered that it was, if anything, a good omen, and that he would have excellent luck if he were to go hunting. As none of the family are superstitious, no objection was made to the young man's plans.

An hour later all the members of the family, with the exception of Otto and his aged grandmother, journeyed to church. The services had hardly started when there was vividly recalled to Mr. Schaubert's mind the story his son had told in the morning of the strange dream he had had during the night. Mr. Schaubert became very nervous and hurried home with his family as soon as the church services were concluded. The aged grandmother was asked by Mr. Schaubert if she had seen Otto, and replied in the negative, but said that she had heard a shot about 11 a. m.

Within a few minutes all of the members of the family were making a search for the missing boy. At first they called his name, and, receiving no answer, they made the search thorough.

It was the father's lot to find his son, lying, as the boy had dreamed, in a pool of blood. The body was warm, but life had been extinct for half an hour. His shotgun lay by his side. One barrel had been fired and the deep, powder-burned wound in Otto's abdomen showed where the charge had entered his body. The boy was apparently in the act of climbing over the fence when his gun was accidentally discharged. The wound was so severe that he was unable to make an outcry, and as he was some distance from the house, he slowly bled to death.

The shock of Otto's death almost prostrated his parents. He was an energetic young man and was very popular with the young folks with whom he associated.

Sunday Schools Declining.

Reports read in the Kansas State Sunday School Convention, late in session at Atchison, showed a falling off of about 200 Sunday schools in that State since 1896. Though 908 Sunday schools have been established in Kansas in 25 years, only 3,000 pupils have been added during that time, as the report showed.

The population of Kansas has been more than doubled during the last 25 years, and her material prosperity is unparalleled in any State, yet her Sunday schools do not keep pace with population and prosperity.

All reports agree in the statement that the public schools of Kansas are not excelled anywhere, and that learning is almost universal. Perhaps that fact explains why sectarian schools, in the interest of superstition, are not more popular.

Trend Is Toward Liberalism.

It is now claimed by the New York Sun that "the general trend of Presbyterianism is towards Unitarianism, and the ethical culture of Channing, of two generations ago." The leading minds of Presbyterians are quite too intelligent to take any stock in virgin-born Gods. They are ashamed of their "damnation of infants not a span long." Their philosophy has taught them that there was no fall of man; that the eternal hell of former years was a priestly device to frighten men into goodness, and subserviency to priestly rule. They will cling for a time to the idea that Jesus was a great moral teacher; but the more profound their search, the sooner their conviction, that what is passing as the teachings of Jesus are only compilations from earlier teachers.

Would Do It Had They Power.

Is it a fact that the churches are about to shut off the Falls of Niagara, interpose obstacles in the clouds to prevent thunder, and hang a curtain between the earth and the sun on Sundays so man shall not desecrate the holy Sabbath? The great Creator lost his opportunity when he neglected to make a clear distinction between Sunday and Monday, if he desired Sunday to be specially appropriated to his service.

Sundays are like all other days. The then Supreme Pontiff of Roman Paganism, the Emperor Constantine, in the year 321, ordered the first day of the week to be kept sacred to the sun, not to God. In due time Christian priests appropriated that day to their use, and have been falsely laboring ever since to make it appear the day is heaven-ordained, and sacred to the worship of a three-headed God.

Lese Majesty Again.

The editor of a German comic paper, Dr. Johannes Trojan, has just arrived in New York, after six months' imprisonment in his native country for lese majesty. The unfortunate journalist published a cartoon showing Alexander the Great, Hannibal, Caesar, and other famous heathen field marshals in a state of great hilarity over the assertion of Emperor William that only good Christians could be good soldiers.

It seems the Kaiser, who Captain Coghlan credited with saying—

"Gott pulls mit me, and I mit Him, Myself—und Gott," does not love to be made the subject of mirth because of his silly utterances.

Incompatible Occupations.

Rev. O. D. McKeever, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Mingo Junction, O., finding his salary too small to eke out an existence for his family opened up a butcher shop, where he presided over block and cleaver as gracefully as in the pulpit; but his parishioners thought the two occupations incompatible, and compelled the honest and industrious pulpiteer to resign his ministerial charge.

Paul, it seems, was a tent-maker, and plied his ministerial duties while working at his trade. Had he lived in this age, he, too, would have been forced to step down and out.

A small debt produces a debtor; a large one an enemy.—Publius Syrus.

THE DESTINY OF LIFE.

On What Lines Is It to Be Worked Out?

In the answering of that question on which hinges the hopes and happiness, or the discord and resulting unhappiness of human life, the reply must be made according to the interpretation that each individual soul is capable of giving as they judge the question from the standpoint of their intellectual and spiritual development. What would be the fulfilling of life's destiny, giving a pleasure bounded only by its individual limitations; would to those who having broadened their researches produce only misery. That the question of what is the destiny of life can be understood and a satisfactory answer given as it is viewed from the standpoint of the universal race tendencies we believe; but to be able to satisfactorily solve that problem comparisons must be drawn between the conditions of life as they existed in the ancient civilizations, and as they exist in the modern, and of its different phases as they appear and as they have been transmitted to us through historical records whether of man's recording as classified in the literature of the world; or whether it came direct as the result of nature's handiwork as she has inscribed them in her temples not made by hands.

What is the average of human life at the present time? Is it superior to that of the past centuries and millenniums? We know that there are in existence at the present time races inferior to some of those that existed in the past and which have disappeared as far as the existence of distinct racial types. And we also know that there are races at the present that have developed a form of civilization superior to any that history records. Not in the development merely of the material forces and their utilization as a means for further advancement, of which steam and the electrical force are foremost representatives; but also in the efforts made and partially successful to bring about that advanced spiritual condition of human life, the recognition of universal race unity, which is to be consummated not by the extinction of those special racial types which are the result largely of climatic environment, but by so harmonizing them that they will realize that those racial characteristics are not that impassable barrier once supposed to their unification on the lines of a harmonious working toward a higher destiny.

To the intelligent investigator of life's problems, who is trying to bring into an orderly system the chaotic and conflicting opinions of the separate schools of thinkers; trying to harmonize their differences and have them work in concord on the great problem of human advancement, must admit that taking an average and comparing the ancient races civilized and barbarous with those at the present time which are classed in the same catagory, that we have done even better than the son of Erin's Isle who said that "he started with nothing and had held his own," and that we have advanced a step toward solving the problem of the ages, and where it is becoming more of a fact and not a fanciful theory that "our country is the world and our countrymen all mankind."

That the development of the mechanical forces to that state of perfection which they have attained in our modernized life has been a factor in the progressive unfoldment of life on the lines of a higher humanitarianism and a more perfest spiritual growth must be admitted as a lessening of the comparative distance of the nations of the world, bringing them out of their hermit state and placing them where they will feel the force of the whole thought-world sitting in judgment upon their recorded acts, will work harmoniously, and by the force of irresistible circumstances compel them to recognize as their neighbor universal humanity regardless of race or color.

While we reverently acknowledge the supremacy and grandeur of character typified in those whose mission it is to be the advance guard of the world's reformers, who have met with a bold front the antagonism of ignorance, and are determined to battle long and bravely that those higher conceptions of the universal truth may be dominant in life, we must place them under an entirely different classification with those chronic grumblers who are determined while posing as reformers that we shall go to the bow-wows any way, and that all of the advance that has been made is only tending thither. The former are intelligently striving to advance life step by step though slowly but surely to that higher destiny which must be the result of those efforts; they showing that many times the mistakes are of great educational value in showing where are located the obstacles that intercept and impede the advance movement. The latter without doubt are honest but are living so completely in the future probabilities and anticipations that they almost forget that there is a present that demands immediate attention in the evolution of its problems which must be consummated before life can be prepared to take up the next lesson of its unfolding destiny.

"Trust no future howe'er pleasant,
Let the dead past bury its dead;
Act, act in the living present,
Heart within and God o'erhead."

To show that, regardless of the apparent antagonistic reactionary movements of life, the finger of destiny is pointing forward and never backward, we have only to view the advance of human society toward a more just comprehension of its duty in the measure that it metes out to its unfortunates that it feels obliged to place under restraint. The brutal systems of the past ages are slowly giving way before the growth of that sentiment which teaches that prevention is better than the after treatment which only has for its object the infliction of punishment. Though in a comparatively crude state where it yet deals more with the effects rather than with the causes that are producing the discordant vibrations of life, but which will through education and experience in the superiority of the advance methods be corrected.

Human progress is not the result of blind chance. The destiny of life has not been directed in its career by that sightless phantom, but at times it seemingly has been used as an auxiliary subordinated to those fixed purposes which have out of apparent chaos cast up a highway on which can travel life to that higher and more glorious destiny. There are times in the history of those events that make and unmake governmental systems, when to the individual soul who has entered the inner temple of life there can be seen the direct operation of those causes that shape the destiny of those nations that are at the time in the direct line of those forces which are demolishing and building anew on more advanced lines. A forcible illustration is presented in the extinction of Spain's dominion over the last remnant of her colonial possessions which the world has lately witnessed. With due consideration for the differences of opinion concerning the proper methods to pursue in assisting their advancement, which seems to be very much impeded under the old environments, we believe there are no unprejudiced minds but will admit that the spiritual forces directed the course of events that culminated in the overthrowal of medieval despotism, and in its place planting the seeds of political and religious freedom in a soil watered by the tears of struggling souls ready for their emancipation.

The doubting materialist will question, why was not all of this accomplished before if those forces that you claim were so powerful to consummate those results? For the very same reason that the intelligent producer of the fruits and vegetables that are of great value when matured does not harvest them in their immature state; also for the same reason that the intelligent teacher does not undertake to instruct the pupil in the higher branches without due preparation in the lower ones. The progressive destiny of life is of slow growth. It is like the upheavals that geologists tell us are taking place in certain parts of our globe, which to ascertain the advance movements needs the most delicate instruments and accurate measurements; but the advance is there and irresistible in its force. Thus it is with the spiritual power that is uplifting and remolding human thought and its resultant actions. Prohibitory edicts and proclamations cannot impede its advance, as it is from a higher source that progressive life draws its inspiration. Those whose spiritual vision enables them to look beyond the external signs manifest in the glamour thrown around the brutal arbitrament of war, can see that it is a truth that the wrath of man is overruled and made to redound to his progress when conditions are ready for an advance movement.

Finally the destiny of life is a ceaseless activity, using the material at hand with which to fashion its highest conception of what constitutes its duty to the present and future, and while advancing it is drawing by that irresistible power manifested by the superior over the inferior all forms of life whether in the animal or vegetable realm. Witness the improvement of the fruits, flowers and vegetables that he has taken from their primitive state and through that superior power manifest in his life made them things of beauty and utility. Could the rose have attained to its present state of perfection unaided? Certainly not within the present limitations in regard to time, if ever. The great law of attraction and sympathy which binds all of the forms of life together and dominated by the law of eternal progression must advance them all together even if they do occupy higher or lower positions in the ranks of the procession. The type of genus homo does not hold a monopoly of the progressive energies, but as the highest manifestation of that power it is the leader, carrying the burden of the whole world on its back. In his efforts toward a higher destiny and to bring the world to that condition we do not wonder that he sometimes stumbles, considering the load he is carrying, but that is not retrogression. As each forward step is taken by human life, the road over which it has traveled is forever closed; there are no backward moves.

HAMILTON DEGRAW.

Shakers, N. Y.

Law Uniform in Its Action.

Guided by the Bible and the claims of the church, it is apparent Rev. Wm. A. Echols, of Middleport, Ohio, who dropped dead in the auditorium of the Washington and Compton Avenue Presbyterian church, on May 17, when the Presbyterian General Assembly was about opening its session, had in some manner incurred the displeasure of God, hence the mournful affliction.

Are not these sudden deaths of clergymen subject to the same law as that which destroyed Ingersoll and Putnam? If the deaths of the latter were evidences of God's displeasure, is not the same true in the case of the preacher?

Paganism Everywhere.

Decking houses and churches with evergreens is a custom of Pagan origin. The ancient Druids decked their houses with holly and ivy in December, that the Sylvan spirits might repair them, and remain unnipped by the frost and cold winds till a milder sun renewed the foliage of their favorite resorts.

Moderns practice the same custom, very generally ignorant of its source, but seem to suppose it denotes immortality.

A Test in Court.

A pulpit-pounder in Monroe county, Pa., prayed God to destroy a new brewery. Faithful to the promise of his Son, God sent a bolt of lightning, as requested, towards that beer factory and it went up in smoke. The proprietors, it is reported, threaten legal proceedings against the preacher for damages. There'll be fun on that trial if it ever comes off.

KING SOLOMON'S
Mining Co., Lima, Ohio.

The Hon J. B. Townsend announces that on July 1st "Our twenty-cent mining stock will be advanced to fifty cents a share. Not one share can be bought less than that after that date. I am exceedingly anxious that every Spiritualist should have some of this low-priced stock."

For full particulars in reference to this mining stock, address Mr. Townsend at Lima, Ohio. He fully believes that the angel world is back of his enterprise, and he wants Spiritualists to reap a rich harvest by the purchase of stock.

"Three Jubilee Lectures." By J. M. Peebles, M. D. Doctor Peebles is a trenchant and instructive writer and lecturer, and these three addresses on the occasion of and pertinent to the Jubilee of Modern Spiritualism, are well worthy of being preserved in this tasty form, in print. Price, 35 cents. For sale at this office.

"The Priest, the Woman and the Confessional." This book, by the well known Father Chiniquy, reveals the degrading, impure influences and results of the Romish confessional, as proved by the sad experience of many wrecked lives. Price, by mail, $1. For sale at this office.

"Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism: or a Concordance of the Principal Passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism; together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible." By Moses Hull. The well-known talented and scholarly author has here embodied the results of his many years' study of the Bible in its relations to Spiritualism. As its title denotes, it is a veritable encyclopedia of information on the subject. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Commandments Analyzed." By W. H. Bach. The Commandments are not only analyzed, but contrasted with other Bible passages, showing great incongruities. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Pantheism of Modern Science.

By F. E. Titus, Barrister,
Of Toronto, Canada.

Matter--Unity of Structure.

Turning now to the second great aspect, Matter, we find that here also a great change has taken place and great progress been made.

We formerly heard much about the seventy-three elements and the four kingdoms—the mineral, vegetable, animal and human.

There was a very strong idea that in the seventy-three elements we had arrived at as near the beginning of material existence as it was possible to reach. And each of the four kingdoms was deemed a separate domain of nature, and until recently the great majority of naturalists believed that species were immutable productions and had been separately created. Darwin's genius cleared the way (though to Lamarck probably belongs the honor of being the pioneer of our age) to the recognition that the human and the brute were more closely related than was theretofore thought to be the case. "The Origin of Species" was written, as Mr. Darwin himself informs us, with the two distinct objects of (1) showing that species had not been separately created and (2) of showing that natural selection had been the chief agent of change. The whole of this vast collection of facts and of deductions based thereon is an argument—primarily directed to demonstrating Unity of Type in the vertebrates—(by vertebrates is meant all animals having a jointed spinal column). At page 183 of the above mentioned work, we find him saying, "According to this view it may be inferred that all vertebrate animals with true lungs have descended by ordinary generation from an ancient and unknown prototype, which was provided with a floating apparatus or swim-bladder," and he proceeds to cite instances of the conversion of an organ from one function to another. He subsequently informs us that "It is generally admitted that all organic beings have been formed on two great laws—Unity of Type and the Conditions of Existence. By unity of type is meant that fundamental agreement in structure which we see in organic beings of the same class, and which is quite independent of their habits of life." His theory explains that unity of type by unity of descent. Mr. Darwin's whole theory of evolution rests upon the basis of the existence of some one common prototypal form having within itself the capacity of the infinite variations of structure which exist in the forms which have been derived therefrom.

But Mr. Darwin's genius for scientific hypothesis carried him much further than the unity of species, and from the facts which he had collected he was led to the conclusion that not only had all animals a common origin, but he adds, "Analogy would lead us one step further, namely, to the belief that all animals and plants are descended from some one prototype. But analogy may be a deceitful guide. Nevertheless all living things have much in common—in their chemical composition, their cellular structure, their laws of growth, and their liability to injurious influences. We see this even in so trifling a fact as that the same poison often similarly affects plants and animals; or that the poison secreted by the gall-fly produces monstrous growths on the wild rose or oak tree. With all organic beings, sexual reproduction seems to be essentially similar. With all, as far as is at present known, the germinal vesicle is the same; so that all organisms start from a common origin. If we look even to the two main divisions—namely, to the animal and vegetable kingdoms—certain low forms are so far intermediate in character that naturalists have disputed to which kingdom they should be referred, and, as Prof. Asa Gray has remarked, 'The spores and other reproductive bodies of many of the lower algae may claim to have first a characteristically animal, and then an unequivocally vegetable existence.' Therefore on the principle of natural selection with divergence of character, it does not seem incredible that, from some such low and intermediate form, both animals and plants may have been developed; and, if we admit this, we must likewise admit that all organic beings which have ever lived on this earth may be descended from some one primordial form. But this inference is chiefly grounded on analogy, and it is immaterial whether or not it be accepted." (Origin of Species 5th Edition p. 432.)

The Protoplasmic State.

(or the Ebb and Flow of Intelligence).

Prof. Huxley in his paper on "Evolution in Biology" (Science and Culture," page 299), referring to the latter part of the seventeenth and the first half of the eighteenth century, says: "In the then state of knowledge it appeared that all the species of animals and plants could be arranged in one series, in such a manner that, by insensible gradations, the mineral passed into the plant, the plant into the polype, the polype into the worm, and so on, through gradually higher forms of life, to man at the summit of the animated world."

But this statement of the facts apparently took no note of the ebb and flow of life; of the tendency, which is so marked as to seem to be a universal law; of living matter to return to its centre and source when it has exhausted the possibilities of the form in which it was temporarily enshrined; to re-emerge in some higher form of expression, from which the ensouling life again returns to its basic form when its temporary clothing is again worn out.

It seems now to be accepted by scientists that a return to the protoplasmic condition takes place after each manifestation of matter in organic structure. It follows therefore that there must be this common base upon which all living forms rest, and through which they are connected. The matter which has manifested in gross physical structure apparently carries with it, upon its return to the protoplasmic state, some controlling tendency which inheres in it and causes it upon its re-emergence on the plane of form to be clothed in a physical structure similar to, though higher than, that in which it had previously appeared.

This swing of consciousness from structure to function and from function to structure, was not indicated in the earlier scientific proposition. "But," Prof. Huxley proceeds to inform us, "as knowledge advanced this conception" (of direct ascent) "ceased to be tenable in the crude form in which it was first put forward. Taking into account existing animals and plants alone, it became obvious that they fell into groups which were more or less sharply separated from one another; and moreover, that even the species of a genus can hardly ever be arranged in linear series." How, then, can their relation to each other be symbolized? The Professor answers, "Their natural resemblances and differences are only to be expressed by disposing them as if they were branches springing from a common hypothetical centre." The effect of these conclusions has been, as Mr. Huxley points out, rather to substitute a new metaphor for the old than to abolish the conception expressed by it. "Instead of regarding living things as capable of arrangement in one series like the steps of a ladder, the result of modern investigation compels us to dispose them as if they were the twigs and branches of a tree. The ends of the twigs represent individuals, the smallest groups of twigs species, larger groups genera, and so on until we arrive at the source of all these ramifications of the main branch, which is represented by a common plan of structure, and, when the lowest forms of each are considered, even the animal and vegetable kingdoms cease to have a definite frontier." It therefore becomes necessary to introduce a more comprehensive figure, which Mr. Huxley accordingly does. "If it is permissible to speak of the relation of living forms to one another metaphorically, the similitude chosen must undoubtedly be that of a common root, wherein two main trunks, one representing the vegetable and one the animal world, spring; and, each dividing into a few main branches, these subdivide into multitudes of branchlets and these into smaller groups of twigs."

In the opinion of Mr. Huxley the unity of structure has been proven. "Morphology," (the science of the study of forms) he says, "exhibits a continual advance towards the demonstration of a fundamental unity among the seeming diversities of living structures. And this demonstration has been completed by the final establishment of the cell theory, which involves the admission of a primitive conformity, not only of all the elementary structures in animals and plants respectively, but of those in the one with those in the other." This common parentage of all forms, it is evident to Mr. Huxley, lies at the very root of the doctrine of evolution, and, according to him, "No a priori difficulty can be said to stand in the way of evolution, when it can be shown that all animals and all plants proceed by modes of development, which are similar in principle, from a fundamental protoplasmic material."

Only recently (July 20, 1899) our daily press contained a report of an interesting confirmation of the statement that there is a structural unity between the tissues of the human flesh and vegetable fibre. From Paris came interesting details of Dr. Bra's recent cancer researches. Dr. Bra found parasites similar to that of the cancer in fragments of diseased wood, particularly apple wood. He obtained the government's permission to inoculate forest trees at Meudon with cultures of human cancer, and six months later he found spots of dry rot in these trees. The trees were principally beeches, maples and sycamore. One elm tree died of cancer so communicated to it.

Prof. Wm. Crookes, in his lecture on the "Genesis of the Elements," dwells upon the fact of this unity. He explains that protyle "is a word analogous to protoplasm, to express the idea of the original primal matter existing before the evolution of the chemical elements." He declares that before the first element came into existence "matter, as we know it, was not. It is equally impossible to conceive of matter without energy, as energy without matter; from one point of view both are convertible terms." And he closes his address in these luminous words, "Summing up all the considerations, we cannot indeed, venture to assert positively that our so-called elements have been evolved from one primordial matter; but we may contend that the balance of the evidence, I think, fairly weighs in favor of this speculation." And again Prof. Crookes tells his audience: "If I venture to say that our commonly received elements are not simple and primordial, that they have not arisen by chance or have not been created in a desultory and mechanical manner, but have been evolved from simpler matters—or perhaps indeed from one sole kind of matter—I do but give formal utterance to an idea which has been, so to speak, for some time 'in the air' of science. Chemists, physicists, philosophers of the highest merit, declare explicitly their belief that the seventy (or thereabouts) elements of our textbooks are not the pillars of Hercules which we must never hope to pass."

Nikola Tesla, the electrician, is firmly convinced (see page 149 of Nikola Tesla, His Inventions, etc.) that "of all the views of nature, the one which assumes one matter and one force, and a perfect uniformity throughout, is the most scientific and the most liable to be true."

Thus we see that most eminent scientists have arrived at the conclusion that two out of the three factors in the composition of the universe are each in themselves a unity, producing the varied phenomena by the varied degrees of vibration of the one operating upon the equally varied degrees of density of the other; and, not only are each of these things thought to be one at the basis, but scientific and philosophic speculation alike declare that the two are inseparable; that in fact, force and substance are simply two aspects or characteristics of some uncomprehended fact or cause which stands back of them.

Transmutation of Forms of Matter.

But if the unity of substance be a fact, then there is a possibility of transmuting one form of matter into another. That this is within the bounds of probability is now demonstrated apparently to the satisfaction of leading scientists. As a result of the experiments made by Prof. J. J. Thompson of Cambridge, England, we have the editor of the Electrical World and Engineer saying: "It had until recently been supposed that matter could not be divided more finely than into molecules, and that these were chemically divisible into atoms. But the atom was the end of all dissection, while an atom of iron was absolutely and completely distinct from an atom of some other substance, such as lead. Now it would seem that we can tear off minute chips from atoms, and that the chips so torn off lose identity and cannot be distinguished from one another. Of course, the suggestion naturally follows, as a matter of speculation, that if we could tear off a sufficient number of chips from the atoms of any substance, it might be possible to rearrange or reconstruct the chips in a new way, and possibly produce an atom of a different substance; or, in other words, that the process of tearing chips away from atoms is analysis of matter into 'protyle,' or the mother substance from which all chemical elementary substances may have been originally constructed."—From Literary Digest, April 14, 1900.

To show there is a common bond of unity between even the different kingdoms of nature, the mineral, vegetable and animal—some primal atomic or common condition, some homogeneous substance in nature, some elemental essence, from the aggregations and combinations of which all forms are built up—we have the evidence furnished by the processes of digestion and assimilation in man himself. The vegetable is by the physiological action of the human body changed into flesh or other animal state. The vegetable kingdom not only has the power to assimilate earth (mineral) and change it from mineral to vegetable, but the vegetable is in turn digested and assimilated by the animal and thus carried into an entirely different kingdom of nature. The dream of the alchemist of the transmutation of metals is mere child's play compared with the processes of nature occurring every day in the human body. This capability of being changed from one form to another must rest upon the fact that all forms of matter have as their basis one common element—their conception of which is by our scientific friends variously denominated "primordial matter," "protoplasm," "homogeneous substance," "protyle," each of these terms being intended to designate the first form of matter. In order to change from one kingdom of matter to another it is necessary for the object to be resolved to this primal condition, by the disintegration of its present and all intermediate forms. Thus reduced, it is ready to be operated upon by other intelligences, which mold it into the desired new form of matter.

The One Life.

The same facts which have led investigators to these conclusions in reference to force and substance have also led others to the recognition of the probability that there is a Common Reservoir of Life which stands back of its myriad manifestations upon the physical plane; a great ocean of vitality which each organized being absorbs and gives out as we inhale and exhale the air we breathe. That each being is thus affecting and being affected by the remainder of the universe. This serves as another link which binds the universe into one organic whole.

The Living Atom.

We have spoken of the definition of the atom formerly given us by the physicists "the hard, inelastic, indivisible, inert, dead, ultimate subdivision of matter." Each necessarily separate, distinct, discontinuous, clearly defined from the other.

This hypothetical atom was dead, so we were told. No wonder that Spencer declared that between such matter as that, and mind, there existed a chasm which it was impossible to bridge. Imagination could not picture any conceivable process by which unconscious force applied to dead matter could give as a product, thought, consciousness, intelligence, and Mr. Spencer gave up the attempt in despair. The electrician, dealing with a higher grade of matter found the old idea of matter as inert, dead, and inelastic would not fit in with the facts which came within his range of observation. A new definition has gradually grown up. It is now said that an atom is an electrical centre of force and motion. No longer inert, it is believed to be pulsating with force itself. The dividing line between force and matter disappears. The two are found to be linked indissolubly together. Pointing out that the unprejudiced study of physical philosophy provides us with analogies which lead us almost directly to the opinion of the existence of immaterial substances, and enumerating solids, liquids, gases, electricity and magnetism, universal ether and gravitation, the celebrated Dr. Thomas Young says: "And of these different orders of beings, the more refined and immaterial appear to pervade freely the grosser. It seems therefore natural to believe that the analogy may be continued still further, until it rises into existences absolutely immaterial and spiritual * * * others pervade each other unseen and unknown, in the same space."

In view of this infinite gradation of matter and its interconvertibility between less and more inert forms, it is not surprising to find that many physicists deem life to be co-eternal with matter.

According to the hypothesis of natural evolution adopted by Prof. Tyndall (Fragments of Science, American Edition 1872, p. 156) "Life was present potentially in matter when in the nebulous form, and was unfolded from it by the way of natural development." As Prof Tyndall therein points out, unless it be granted that life is an inherent quality of matter in its undifferentiated, inorganic (so-called) condition, then we must accept the only other alternative, namely, that "it is a principle inserted into the matter at a later date." Scientific research all leads away from rather than towards this latter conclusion. The idea of inherent powers and qualities, gradually unfolding under the operation of natural laws, rather than a supernatural, extra-cosmic volition introducing arbitrarily new forces, is the firm rooted conviction of modern science.

The logical necessity for this eternal pre-existence of life led Prof. Huxley to declare, (page 284, Science and Culture), "and the evidence has yet to be adduced which will satisfy any cautious reasoner that 'Omne Vivum Ex Vivo' is not as well established a law of the existing course of nature as 'Omne Viyum Ex Ovo.'"

So far as the question of life is concerned the distinction between organic and inorganic is more a matter of degree than of kind. Mr. Alfred Binet in his preface to "The Psychic Life of Micro-organisms" informs us that the teachings of general physiology "shows us that all vital phenomena are previously present in non-differentiated cells." To classify one non-differentiated cell as organic, and another as inorganic, is an arbitrary distinction which the discovery of evolution in the mineral world is gradually setting aside.

Mineral organisms hitherto deemed simple have been found to be complex; and to describe a form of matter as inorganic, is probably nothing more than a confession that the power of the instrument has reached its limit.

Wherever there is matter, there also is motion, and force is bounded and conditioned by matter. Instead of matter being dead, it is found that the mysterious thing called life is ever present in it. In fact what better definition can be found for life than that which would describe it as conscious force operating in matter, or, if we wish to describe its process, the conscious operation of force in matter?

The All-Pervading Intelligence.

Until recently, as we have seen, minerals were spoken of as inanimate and non-progressive. Evolution and consciousness were thought to apply to animal and human beings alone. The change of thought in reference to this has been remarkable in its rapidity and its scope. To speak of plants having souls; minerals having human characteristics, and selective power being found in the inorganic world, would a few years since have been thought an indication of an ill-balanced mind, or an excessively developed poetic temperament. The author of such expressions would certainly not have been regarded as an exponent of scientific observation and deduction. All that is changed now. The inherent selective and adaptive power of all forms of matter—in other words the living consciousness of nature—is everywhere found exhibited. Professor Cope declares that, "The entire process of ascending evolution appears to be dependent on the presence of mind, i. e., consciousness in gradually more complex stages."

This is the case even in the elemental world. When the chemist takes two parts of hydrogen and brings them into contact with one part of oxygen with the result of the formation of a drop of water, can he do this entirely irrespective of the selective and formative inherent powers of hydrogen and oxygen? Surely not. Water is formed from the gases by the ordinary powers of nature without intervention at all. Is there some great "chemist-physicist" superintending nature's operations, sorting out two parts of hydrogen and one part of oxygen and mixing them together? If not, then we must believe in the inherent power of nature to produce this as well as other phenomena of nature.

But is there no intelligence exhibited when the chemist brings about this result in his laboratory? There must be somewhere an equal intelligence to produce those results in nature's laboratory. If intelligence be a factor in one case it must be a factor in the other. To produce the identical result the sum of the factors must be the same. The chemical constituents of hydrogen and oxygen, or force and substance, are the same, therefore the third factor—intelligence, selective power—must also be present.

Moreover, there is no aimless shuffling of the atoms until chance produces a fortuitous chemical combination. The union is instantaneous, self selective, and invariably responsive to the influence of affinity induced by their proximity. No hesitancy—no fumbling for a compatible alliance, but a mutual recognition of congeniality at the moment of contact, which intelligence alone could bring about. Chance with its "fortuitous concourse of atoms" will not serve to explain it. It cannot be fortuitous if similar conditions produce similar results. It it were fortuitous then sometimes the formula would be H_2O, and sometimes HO_2. Prof. Crookes, in "Elements and Meta-elements," describing certain of his experiments with the precipitation of so-called elements, instancing yttrium, says: "We cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that the action which has been going on for the past few hours is of a selective character. Out of the multitude of atoms present, what power is it that directs each atom to choose the proper path; we may picture to ourselves some directive force passing the atoms one by one in review, selecting one for precipitation and another for solution until all have been adjusted."

But the process of selection includes the exercise of the power of discrimination, and discrimination is the surest indication of the presence of intelligence or consciousness; so that this directive force, inherent in, or inseparably connected with the very smallest subdivision of the inorganic, elemental world, carries with it the most conclusive evidence that there is a consciousness within it. The sphere of its operation is very limited it is true, but within those limitations (and all consciousness of which we have knowledge works within limitations) its action is apparently more reliable than in man himself, in whom the consciousness has evolved and other qualities have been awakened which often interfere with the accuracy and wisdom of his choice.

An objection commonly made to the proposition that there is an intelligence in the elemental kingdom of nature, is the fact that in it we sometimes witness the non-beautiful, the destructive and the seemingly cruel. But the slightest consideration shows that these facts, even when true, are not inconsistent with intelligence. Intelligent man is often ungraceful, while the evidence of his destructiveness and cruelty are everywhere about us. The objectors are apparently oblivious of the absurdity of demanding that the lower kingdoms shall exhibit nobler qualities than we find in man himself. That nature produces at times in her lower kingdoms incongruities, misshapen forms, or destructive cataclysms, is no more evidence of lack of consciousness than is the production by the tailor of a misfit coat, the building by a logician of a fallacious syllogism, or the destruction of his own property by a man in a fit of anger.

The Sensitive Mineral.

Mr. Roberts-Austin, C. B., F. R. S., Professor in the Royal College of Science, London, England, and chemist to the Royal Mint, lectured in Toronto in 1897, under the auspices of the British Association, then meeting there. The following extracts, taken from the Globe (August 21, 1897) report of his address, shows how little difference in kind there is between the organic and inorganic, though there may be much in degree. After showing some beautiful and interesting experiments, the Prof. said: "The experiments shown taught that metals, even when solid, were not the inert things they were supposed to be; they were really vibratory masses of great complexity. * * * * Metals are in fact sensitive things, almost sentient in their organization, strangely lifelike in their behavior. Of their genesis much might be written, and most physicists are now ready to accept, at least in principle, as the result of the life-long work of Sir Norman Lockyer, the hypothesis that the phenomena of the inorganic world are dominated by an evolution not less majestic, although much more simple, than that now universally accepted in the case of organic nature. For the main evidence on which this hypothesis rests we have hitherto turned to the spectrum analysis of the glowing atmosphere of the sun. There may be some who dread the extension of the great principle of evolution which these words imply and shrink from recognizing that the elements as we know them have, like our own species, been derived from simpler forms. * * * The metallurgist is beginning to study the molecular motion in solid metals which makes them so like living organisms."

Sir Norman Lockyer, in the following forceful words, emphasizes the fact that solid metals are in a continual state of molecular motion: "The modern physicist tells us that the stones of which St. Paul's Cathedral is built, consist of millions upon millions of small particles called molecules; and that although St. Paul's Cathedral seems to be absolutely at rest, as if it would last forever, and although each particular stone seems equally so, yet when you get down into the intimate structure of each stone, and of every part of the fabric, you get nothing but a multitudinous ocean of motion. What appears to us solid and at rest, is absolutely in a perpetual state of unrest; in fact its stability consists in its state of unrest." (Studies in Spectrum Analysis p. 41).

But we have been informed by our scientific friends ("The Cell Theory," in Scientific Memoirs of T. H. Huxley, page 241 et seq.), that the distinction between living and non-living matter is that in the former there exists the inherent faculty of exhibiting definite cycles of change in form and composition without any external assistance, and in fact even notwithstanding external opposition, while non-living matter has the quality of inertia, and is capable of no change except that which external forces impose upon it. Of the nature of that something which constitutes the inherent power of change physiology does not assume to give us any information.

But after all is it so certain that inorganic matter possesses no inherent power of change? On the contrary, what means the molecular movement of the stones of St. Paul's Cathedral, mentioned by Sir Norman Lockyer, save that here is some inner hidden power which marshals and controls its innumerable host of molecules and keeps them whirling with tireless energy notwithstanding the changes of external conditions which are continually exerting themselves upon it?

The so-called inorganic world, as we have just been informed by the eminent metallurgist, Sir Roberts-Austin, is dominated by Evolution. Evolution depends upon the inherent power of the evolving entity to respond to external influences. It rests upon the supposition that that entity survives which can thus best adapt itself to its surroundings and overcome the obstacles which it meets in the common life. This adaptability is the essential basis of all evolution, and when the chemist of the Royal Mint speaks of the mineral as a "sensitive thing," in which evolution is going on, he must justify his expression by the fact that he has discovered in that kingdom the presence of inherent powers similar in nature though lower in degree than those found at work in the higher kingdoms.

In other words, a selective power is present. The mineral is able to discriminate and choose.

Upon this point the metallurgist finds himself supported by no less eminent authority than Sir William Crookes, who, as we have seen, finds selective power present in the very elements themselves. The evolution which is taking place in the mineral kingdom is then the evolution of this selective power, a widening of the range and a strengthening of the power of discrimination. In other words—the evolution going on in the inorganic world is an evolution of intelligence, or life. The one important fact, (namely, an inherent power of change and adaptability) which served to mark the difference between living and dead matter has been found to characterize mineral as well as plant and animal.

While Prof. Roberts-Austin speaks of metals as "in fact sensitive things" and like "living organisms," Prince Kropotkin in the November (1897) number of the Nineteenth Century calls attention to the fact that of the soil (a compound of mineral and vegetable) stronger terms may be used. Dealing in that magazine with the researches of German scientists into the subject of the prevalence of bacteria among the roots of the Leguminosae, one of the great families of plants, and of their essential necessity for the growth and well being of the plants, he says: "As to the scientific value of the discoveries of Winogradsky, Hellriegel, Nobbe, and all other workers in the same field, it is self-evident; they have opened quite a new field of research, and while we were beginning to look too much upon the soil as upon an inert mineral mass, they have made us revert to the only true conception that the soil maintains life because it is living matter itself." In the words of Prof. Wiley, of the United States Department of Agriculture, "It is a living organism."

WILL BY A LUNATIC.

Pathetic Document by an Inmate of Dunning Asylum.

"There he goes, writing again," said one of the Dunning asylum keepers to a fellow keeper. "I wonder what in the world he finds to write about?"

"I dunno," said the second keeper. "These loony guys have all sorts of queer ideas running through their noddles. Now, that old guy there must have written enough for ten or eleven thousand books since he's been here, but no one ever sees what he writes. He puts it away in his pocket and that's the last of it."

The two men were looking at an elderly man busily scribbling away at a table with a stump of a lead pencil. This man, by the way, was once a wealthy citizen of Chicago and a man of some literary ability. Reverses came and his mind gave way, and now he is a county charge. Something attracted his attention, and he got up and walked away, leaving his manuscript on the table. One of the keepers picked it up and looked it over.

"Blest if he hasn't been writing his will," said the keeper. "I guess I'd better turn this over to the warden." He did so, and this is a verbatim copy of the document, the name of the testator only being withheld:

"I, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, do hereby make and publish this, my last will and testament, in order, as justly as I may, to distribute my interests in the world among succeeding men.

"That part of my interests which is known in the land and recognized in the sheep-bound volumes as my property being inconsiderable and of none account, I make no disposal of it in this, my will. My right to life, being but a life estate, is not at my disposal, but, these things excepted, all else in the world I now proceed to devise and bequeath:

"Item—I give to good fathers and mothers in trust for their children all good little words of praise and encouragement and all quaint pet names and endearments, and I charge said parents to use them justly, but generously as the needs of their children shall require.

"Item—I leave to children exclusively, but only for the term of their childhood, all and every the flowers of the fields and the blossoms of the woods, with the right to play among them freely according to the customs of children, warning them at the same time against the thistles and the thorns. And I devise to children the banks of the brooks and the golden sands beneath the waters thereof, with the dragonflies that skim the surface of said waters, and the odors of the willows that dip therein, and the white clouds that float high over the giant trees.

"And I leave to children the long, long days to be merry in, in a thousand ways, and the night and the moon and the train of the milky way to wonder at, but subject, nevertheless, to the right hereinafter given to lovers.

"Item—I devise to boys jointly all the useful, idle fields and common where ball may be played, all pleasant water where one may swim, all snow-clad hills where one may coast, and all streams and ponds where one may fish or where, when grim winter comes, one may skate, to have and to hold the same for the period of their boyhood. And all meadows with the clover blooms and butterflies thereof, the woods with their appurtenances, the squirrels and birds and echoes and strange noises, and all distant places which may be visited, together with the adventures there found. And I give to said boys each his own place at the fireside at night, with all pictures that may be seen in the burning wood, to enjoy without let or hindrance, and without any incumbrance of care.

"Item—To lovers I devise their imaginary world with whatever they may need, as the stars of the sky, the red roses by the wall, the bloom of the hawthorne, the sweet strains of music, and aught else they may desire to figure to each other the lastingness and beauty of their love.

"Item—To young men jointly I devise and bequeath all boisterous, inspiring sports of rivalry, and I give to them the disdain of weakness and undaunted confidence in their own strength. Though they are rude and rough, I leave to them the power of making lasting friendships and of possessing companions, and to them exclusively I give all merry songs and brave choruses to sing with lusty voices.

"Item—And to those who are no longer children or youths or lovers I leave memory, and I bequeath to them the volumes of the poems of Burns and Shakespeare and of other poets, if there be others, to the end that they may live the old days over again freely and fully, without tithe or diminution.

"Item—To our loved ones with snowy crown I bequeath the happiness of old age, the love and the gratitude of their children, until they fall asleep."—Chicago Inter Ocean.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Y., July 7 to 16; Cuba, N. Y., July 21 to 30; Cassadaga Camp, August 4, 5 and 7; Onset Bay, August 12; Sunapee Lake Camp, N. The financial condition of the church was never better—the small deficit being raised at the annual meeting. Quite a liberal guarantee fund for the ensuing year was also subscribed. The School of Psychosophy, including class in Psychosophy—two series, and class in Psychopathy, closed its terms in a most satisfactory manner; the students all manifesting great proficiency and the deepest interest in their studies. The Church will resume its regular Sunday morning services September 16. During the interval Mrs. Richmond will visit various eastern camp-meetings. The School of Psychosophy will resume its sessions in the various departments about October 1.

Mrs. David Thayer writes from Manchester, N. H.: "Many thanks for the beautiful premium books you sent me a short time ago. I would feel lonely without your valuable paper's weekly visits."

Willard Follett writes from Bellevue, Mich.: "The annual all-day meeting of Spiritualists will be held at Follett's Corners, 3½ miles north of Bellevue, on Sunday, June 24. Speakers are Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, and Dr. J. M. Peebles, of Battle Creek, is expected."

J. F. Blaney writes from Malden, Mass.: "I send my heartfelt thanks for the premium books. I am unable to express my appreciation in words to you for the grand and good work you are doing us all as we are journeying on through life."

Dr. Ravlin closed his first year's engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, the last Sunday in May. He has been engaged for another year. He left with Mrs. Ravlin, for Boston, Mass., on the 31st ult. His correspondents will address him care of Banner of Light, 9 Bosworth street, until further notice.

The Columbus, O., Post, May 24, says: "The Ohio State Association of Spiritualists, at its meeting at Columbus, elected officers as follows: President, Thomas A. Black, of Cleveland; first vice-president, W. D. Nicum, of Dayton; second vice-president, C. H. Matthews, of New Philadelphia; secretary, John C. Hemmeter, of Cleveland; treasurer, Carrie Firth Curran, of Toledo; trustees, Messrs Bond of Willoughby, Baxter of Ashley, Townsend of Lima, and Mrs. Kibby of Cincinnati. Delegates to the National Convention at Cleveland in October are: W. J. Hull, of the Light of Truth, Columbus, and C. B. Gould, of Cleveland. Alternates: Mrs. Zetta L. Else, of Galion, and Mrs. Folsom, of Columbus. The meeting this afternoon is an open one and addresses will be made by the members. To-night the principal address will be delivered by J. M. Peebles, the veteran, who has been three times around the world and expects to go again. Tests will be made by Dr. C. H. Figures, of Cleveland, and other addresses will be made. Music will be furnished by Mrs. Else and Miss De Long. Columbus has been chosen as the regular meeting place of the association and the next convention will be held next May."

A. G. Atcheson writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "I want to tell you something about the Young People's Spiritual Institute which was organized about three years ago for the social, moral and psychical development of the younger class of our city. We meet every Tuesday evening, alternating the program with business and social meetings, circles and lectures, and our success assures us we are doing much good. Our annual election of officers was held on Tuesday, May 15, in the First Spiritual Church, resulting in the following choice: President, H. Van Buskirk; first vice-president, Miss Lulu Bradley; second vice-president, Mrs. J. McQuillan; psychic moderator; Mrs. A. Atcheson; assistant moderator, Mrs. J. Wetherell; secretary, L. C. Beesing; treasurer, Miss J. Sutton; librarian, A. G. Atcheson. Trustees, N. H. Eddy, W. Haggerty, A. Near, Laura Bradley, A. G. Atcheson. In connection with the institute we have about seventy volumes as a nucleus for a library, for the benefit of which Mrs. A. G. Atcheson held a public seance in the church on May 22, and it was successful in every respect, about seventy being present. Over twenty tests were given without one failure. Success to our institute and the cause."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The Cleveland (Ohio) Press says: "They say that a Spiritualistic medium located the first oil well at Bradford, Pa., about twenty-five years ago, when this was a little settlement of less than a thousand. The gusher proved such a big success that every person in the hamlet fell to drilling, and to-day the prosperous city of 18,000 surrounded by kopjes of the South African brand, is a vast wilderness of derricks."

J. M. White writes from Alvo, Neb.: "Some very amusing things occurred recently in connection with my missionary work in a town where it was a new thing. Some devout Christians circulated the report that I would have corpses right from the grave walking about the hall, and on coming to the lecture they got where they thought they were safe. One lady said she would take a reading 'just for fun,' but when messages came from her departed husband, uncle and daughters it was not so funny as she had anticipated. My address will be Alvo, Neb., until after presidential election."

Dumont C. Dake, M. D., writes from New York: "Our pen so long silent, is again called upon to chronicle the spiritual doings in this, the Empire City. Where darkness, bigotry and superstition once prevailed, spiritual light is breaking. Progress is the modern gospel. An enlightened peace seems about to dawn upon the world. Where base contentions once prevailed, heavenly reciprocities at last shall stand forth shining with noon-day splendor. Perhaps in no other direction does the rounding of old antagonisms into beautiful symmetry appear to better advantage than in the spiritual influx, the focalization of this divine Arabula which to-day is flooding this earth of ours with its inspiration, and has come to stay. The First Society has closed its meetings for the season, May 27, and will open the first Sunday in October. Mrs. Newton, the president, states that the society is out of debt, and in a prosperous condition. This speaks well for Miss Margaret Gaule, the gifted speaker and noted platform test medium, whose ministrations have been so highly successful. Her mediumship is of a high order, clean cut and convincing. She reaches a large class who would otherwise be unapproachable on the spiritual line. Her messages are comforting to those in sorrow, and convincing to the skeptics. She has faithfully filled her post, with great honor to herself and guides, and with entire satisfaction to her hearers."

Laura B. Payne writes from Topeka, Kansas: "We have recently effected a union of two of the strongest societies here, the Church of the Good Spirit and the Progressive Spiritual Union, under the name of the Church of Spiritualism. The organization is now getting in working order, and the prospects are good for a great forward movement of the cause. Meetings are held twice every Sunday at Lincoln Post Hall, Mrs. L. A. Maybee and myself lecturing, Mrs. Inez Wagner giving tests. There is a good interest in the meetings, and I feel that a good work is being done. One thing so essential to good meetings we certainly have, and that is good singing. Our people 'Sing with the spirit and the understanding.' We make it a point to have the best vocal and instrumental music, which I find is sadly lacking in a great many of the Spiritual congregations. Last Sunday evening memorial services were held in our church. A very impressive and interesting programme was listened to by a large and appreciative audience. Ex-Senator Peffer delivered the memorial sermon, followed by myself with a short address, and Mrs. L. A. Maybee with experiences of war as a soldier's wife. The Church of Spiritualism is chartered under the N. S. A. We have also a society here called 'The Ladies' Temple Builders,' the purpose of which is to collect funds for erecting a Spiritual temple at this place. Thus here and elsewhere the good work goes steadily on, and I feel that at no very far distant day the disciples of Spiritualism will be scattered all over this broad land and will be numbered by the millions."

Mrs. L. B. Brocklebank writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The East End Spiritualists' Society has had with them for the month of May Dr. J. M. Temple, of Washington, D. C. There have been very good meetings each Sunday evening during the Doctor's visit. He has a very pleasing and attractive manner and his tests are very fine, he being able to impersonate the spirits which appear to him so perfectly in every little detail that no one is who is honest to themselves and towards the medium can fail to recognize their friends who come through him."

Abbie E. Sheets began an engagement for the Owosso (Mich.) Spiritualist Society, May 27, remaining there until after June 10. June 16 and 17 she will speak in Sturgis, Mich., at the yearly meeting. She will attend funerals. Permanent address, Grand Ledge, Mich., Box 833. Grand Ledge Camp programs are now ready. Send to M. L. Phares for them.

T. S. Russell writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union is now in charge of Mrs. L. N. Claman, who is giving excellent service as teacher and medium. The entertainment given on the evening of the 24th was one of the best of the year; many strangers were with us to enjoy the good things presented by a number of earnest workers. 'The Family Feud,' a farce, by Irene Russell and others, was highly appreciated. Next month we have 'Ben Hur.'"

Thomas Harding writes: "Mr. Giles B. Stebbins is expected to be present and take part in the exercises (with Dr. J. M. Peebles, Mrs. Sheets and others) at the 'June Meeting' in Sturgis, Mich. This, the 43d anniversary meeting, comes off on Saturday and Sunday, 16th and 17th, in the Spiritual Church in that city. Those conventions have always been remarkable for three good things, viz.: Good speaking, good music and good fellowship. Parties of ten or more can get reduced rates on most railroads. Fix up your business so that you can come."

Mrs. Anna Gillespie writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "I am serving the Harmonia Society here for a time. I have fine audiences and much interest. On account of poor health of my son I have canceled my Eastern camp engagements for this season."

The Columbus, Ohio, Post says: "The Ohio Spiritualists' Association is holding its second annual convention in this city to-day. The preliminary session was held this morning in the old Masonic Cathedral on South Third street, where all the sessions are to be held, and there was quite a large attendance of members from all parts of the State. The afternoon meeting is to be devoted to another business session, but the evening meeting is to be an open one and a number of interesting addresses will be made by prominent Spiritualists of the State. The principal address is to be delivered by ex-Mayor J. B. Townsend, of Lima, who was an associate of the late Senator Brice, and who is well known in this city."

G. Thiese writes from Akron, Ohio: "We had Mrs. T. De. Bartholomew, from Buffalo, N. Y., formerly from Cincinnati and St. Louis, Mo., with us, giving trumpet seances and private sittings."

H. H. Fross writes from the Indiana S. S. Home: "Please correct the name of Mrs. Sheets to that of Mrs. M. E. Skeels, of Onarga, Ill., who spoke here from the 6th to the 10th of this month. The work is growing here nicely."

The Spiritualists everywhere should co-operate with this Western Society for the suppression of vice. The Chicago Herald says that in issuing its annual statement of its work the Western Society for the Suppression of Vice appeals to all classes of citizens who are interested in protecting society from the baneful influences of vile literature, pictures, etc. Since its organization this branch of the society has secured 619 arrests, 498 convictions for crimes against virtue, destroyed over eight tons of vile literature, and 28,000 vile instruments, pictures and packages of medicines. The sentences imposed upon parties arrested aggregate more than 164 years' imprisonment and more than $80,000 in fines, besides costs. It is hard to estimate the baleful and insidious effect of the traffic in obscene literature, disgusting pictures and lewd photographs, upon school children, against which this society wages unceasing war. It seems almost incredible that persons should be found so lost to shame as to engage in the business of disseminating this literary and pictorial filth among the young and unsuspecting for gain. But the records of the Society for the Suppression of Vice testify to the activity and persistence of these propagators of infamy. All those who sympathize with the society in its efforts to destroy this black and insidious traffic should send their contributions to its treasurer, E. G. Keith, Metropolitan National Bank, Chicago. The work should never lack funds.

J. Bullion wwrites from Michigan: "Messick and our sister village, Sherman, are all excitement, and many of our orthodox friends have been led into new channels of thought. Dr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., called upon us on his way home from Frankford, Mich. He delivered two lectures, with tests, in Sherman, on Sunday, May 13, to appreciating audiences. All of the tests, descriptions and names in full, were promptly recognized. He also spoke at our schoolhouse Saturday evening and Monday evening to a house full of curious people, taking subjects from the audience, and followed by tests. He also lectured in the Carpenter schoolhouse, three miles north. Dr. Knowles is a fine magnetic speaker."

W. Nye Means, of Battle Creek, Mich., interested the friends lately at Wonewoc, Wis., with manifestations given through his mediumship. He also visited Reedsburg, where he has a patient.

J. Madison Allen has been busily at work recently at Neosho, Central City, Carterville and Webb City, Mo. General address, 1129 Campbell street, Springfield, Mo.

The Progressive Thinker has taken no part in the controversy (war) going on between the English and Boers. Spirits without number have called it an unholy, unpatriotic and selfish war on the part of England. Here is one fact that we advise all to study carefully: "The Transvaal community is a republic in name only. In reality it is one of the worst oligarchies that ever existed. Equal rights were unknown in this quasi-republic. Roman Catholics and Jews were excluded from political and military offices, and were not allowed to send their children to the free state schools. A section of the Transvaal constitution declares that all persons not Christians can be arrested without warrant."

Will C. Hodge is open for engagements for June, and the first twelve days of July. Will make very reasonable terms with camp associations, or for grove meetings in any locality. Will respond to all calls for funerals. Address 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ill.

J. Madison Allen writes: "Will some one who believes in Infinite Intelligence please state whether Infinite Power and Infinite Love are not also equally entitled to our 'belief' and equally essential to the existence and perpetuity of an Infinite Universe?"

The Independent Church Students of Nature, last Sunday night May 27, at their hall, 1565 Milwaukee avenue, closed their public services there for the summer. The occasion was made a special one, with a profusion of floral decorations and a magnificent token of esteem presented to the pastor, Mrs. M. Summers, who is already engaged for the ensuing year, commencing next September. The pianist, whose faithful services were also recognized, is engaged for the next year. Mrs. Summers is now to occupy a pulpit in the Universalist church at Greenup, Ill., for a season.

Ellen E. Buffam writes from Minnesota: "I wish to thank you for the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit world, which was duly received and is being read by me with much pleasure. I shall pass it around to some of my friends who are unbelievers, and trust it will set some of them to thinking."

H. Howard writes from Toronto, Canada: "The Toronto Spiritual Society has Dr. A. M. Wheeler for the month of June, lecturing and giving tests. The truth is spreading rapidly here in Toronto. Three years ago there was not twenty-five Spiritualists here; now there are hundreds."

The following is from a Redwood (Minn.) paper: "G. W. Kates and wife, Spiritualists, with the wife as the principal portion of the entertainment, were at the opera house last Sunday and Monday, both afternoons and evenings. The crowd was not large at the outset, but Sunday evening found a larger crowd, and Monday afternoon and evening the crowd was still larger. Mr. Kates is a fair reader. Mrs. Kates is a whirlwind of a talker. Words fall from her lips as rapidly as heated honey from an overtaxed hive. She declared that Spiritualism is as much a portion of the Bible as were the other forms of religion, and for every two verses in the Bible against Spiritualism she would point out two in favor of it. She declared that it was as necessary to have a medium between the soul of the dear departed and living relative as dirt between the seed and the air. Mrs. Kates gave several tests and the subjects on which she worked all announced that she was right. Her easiest subject was the local editor of our esteemed contemporary, who was so influenced by the eloquence of the lady that he came near falling off his chair while Mrs. Kates was moving her hands about his face."

H. M. E. writes: "The Court Street Spiritualist Society of Saginaw, Mich., is still holding meetings every Sunday in G. A. R. Hall. The interest among the investigators is steadily increasing. The 27th ult. we had very interesting Memorial Day services. Dr. Eldridge, our regular speaker, delivered the address; some school children sang patriotic songs, and Prof. P. O. Hudson, of Bay City, one of the finest musicians in Michigan, kindly favored us with vocal and violin solos, which were highly appreciated."

Address G. W. Kates and wife, 560 Seventh avenue North, Minneapolis, Minn. All items for the State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota, will reach the secretary, at the same address.

Dr. Emma N. Warne returned last week from an extended trip to Mexico, and will be glad to greet her friends again at 4203 Evans avenue. She enjoyed her trip greatly, returning with renewed strength and vigor. She brings back good reports from Dr. Geo. B. Warne and his mining interests. He will return to Chicago soon.

On the evening of May 22, a large number of friends met at Mrs. Hamilton Gill's residence, to celebrate the twentieth birthday of Normie Keniston, one of Mrs. Gill's principal controls. Mrs. Graham, Miss Lucy Albach, Miss Fash and Professor Tolman contributed largely to the entertainment of the guests by their playing and singing several musical selections. After the ice cream and cake had been served the rest of the evening was devoted to dancing. The parlors were beautifully decorated with flowers, which were presents from many of the friends. The friends will please note that Mrs. Gill's new address is now 82 Oakley Boulevard, where she holds on Thursday evening at 8 p. m., the regular public circle.

Brother Walker writes from Makanda, Ill.: "There are only a few avowed Spiritualists in this vicinity, yet there are many who would be glad to investigate the subject, and if a good, reliable lecturer or test medium would give us a call as they pass on the Illinois Central, I think much good might be done. Fakirs or frauds are not wanted. No discussion in your richly laden columns has surprised me so much as that on the creed question. Why not be content with a statement of the simple, exact truth? State plainly what Spiritualism is, and our belief in it, and in a pure, kind, loving, virtuous, spiritual life, and if anything more is deemed necessary, we might add, that these grand, fundamental principles, being accepted and practiced, Spiritualists are perfectly free to accept and believe what seems true and right to each individual, on all other subjects. It seems to me all could cordially endorse such a creed or statement, and no other. And I am not sure but that we owe it to ourselves, if not to the world, to make such a statement. With your leave I would like to ask Prof. F. E. Titus a question or two. It is claimed that science is based on demonstrated facts, but some intelligent, thinking men with whom I have conversed, hold that the existence of ether and 'ultimate atoms' has never been demonstrated; and that, in the nature of things, it is impossible to count the waves in the ray that produces the violet light, if made with the rapidity as alleged, of 750,000,000,000,000 per second. They say it is assumed guess work. Please give us some information as to how these things are known and demonstrated to be true, and you will oblige many readers of The Progressive Thinker."

G. W. Kates and wife held well-attended and excellent meetings in La Crosse, Wis., May 25, 27 and 28. During June they visit Princeton, Long Lake, Aitkin and Beveridge, Minn., and Grand Forks, N. D. Wheaton, Minn., wants them to dedicate their new temple which is nearly ready for occupancy. Minneapolis and St. Paul societies are arranging a series of grove meetings, to be held during July.

G. F. Perkins writes: "The Beacon Light Church has just enjoyed two entertainments and ice cream socials, May 30 and 31, at 675 Larrabee street. The only unpleasant thing was the extreme warmth of the atmosphere in a crowded hall the first night. The second evening was an improvement so far as comfort was concerned. A splendid program both evenings was given by volunteer talent, some numbers being especially fine. We return thanks for the patronage and assistance of the friends."

Oscar Hamberg writes from Washington: "The Progressive Thinker and seven excellent premium books received. I thank you very much for them."

E. W. Sprague and wife will be at home during the month of June. They have been engaged for the Cassadaga picnic, June 8, 9 and 10, and will serve the society at Lyona, Pa., June 16. They have open dates for the coming fall and winter months. Address 618 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

Mrs. Helen V. Fairchild writes from Denver, Colo.: "I will arrive at Lily Dale, June 20, and remain the entire season, again presenting the divine manifestations of the soul."

Dr. C. W. Hidden, of Newburyport, Mass., was the orator of the day at Portsmouth, N. H., on Memorial Day, and this is what The Times says about it: "The oration by Dr. C. W. Hidden, who for the fourth consecutive year addressed the veterans and friends, was a masterpiece of eloquence, and listened to with closest attention. His personal tributes to those who had died during the year were especially appropriate and in harmony with the day. Dr. Hidden is a speaker who wins the approval of his audience, holds their attention, and to whom it is a rare pleasure to listen. He is heart and soul interested in the work and welfare of the G. A. R. and U. V. U., and as a speaker can rarely be excelled."

Georgia Gladys Cooley writes: "I wish to thank all my friends for their kind words of encouragement and farewell messages. I also express my regrets at not being at home when so many called to say a few words of love. Remember, that space and time are as naught to the spirit, and I will be with you often, even though the cars will carry me over 2,000 miles from you. I most sincerely wish to thank many of the Spiritualists of Chicago and other places for their kind support and sympathies extended to the First Spiritual Church and Sunflower Club. Brother Green of the Forrestville Congregational Church has kindly consented to occupy my platform the last Sunday in September (opening of fall season), and I know all will be in readiness for a good winter's work on my return, the first Sunday in October. My address at present will be 290 Columbia street, Portland, Oregon."

"Poems of Progress," By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." The Commandments Analyzed, price 25 cents. Big Bible Stories, cloth 50 cents.

A VITAL NEED.

More Energy Among Spiritualists.

In this rapid and progressive age when almost every month of each passing year is heavily fraught with some new invention or startling discovery in the realms of science, it would appear to a casual observer to be a very hard matter for a person to even suggest a field in both the mental and physical worlds which has not been thoroughly exhausted. In some respects this may be true, but let all earnest investigators rest assured that there is yet much to discover in, and from, the vast storehouse of the boundless universe. The tireless searcher for pure unalloyed truth can yet find many fruitful spots in which to bestow his talents to a good advantage, one of which I would respectfully suggest as worthy of investigation.

From the early dawn of history up to the present time, man has been exerting almost superhuman energy in a ceaseless effort to discover or devise a system of some kind by which he can correctly read the scroll upon whose mystic pages the inexorable hand of Fate, has already stamped the unborn events of coming years. Ancient history records many instances of numerous individuals as being endowed with this marvelous power, and there are many well-authenticated cases of the present time where a few members of the Gypsy tribe can to a limited extent correctly foretell the future. Yet none who have made these unerring predictions, be who they may, have ever been able to give to the world a lucid explanation of the art or system by which they succeed in reaching such wonderful conclusions. Or many of these truly gifted people when urged to reveal their mode of prophecy, always discreetly veil their ignorance beneath the ever convenient shadow of a deep mystery.

I do not mean this somewhat strong assertion to include Spiritual mediums or clairvoyants. Here, in my opinion, is where earnest workers in the cause of Spiritualism can in many ways greatly assist to enlighten and elevate mankind in many ways from the baneful influence of error and superstition, and at the same time they will not fail in reaping an enduring reward of personal fame. If the true principles of what is now generally considered a disreputable science, were put forth to the world in a clear and concise manner, divested as much as possible of vague, uncertain theories, and all elements of a mysterious character, I think that there would soon be no necessity for the enactment of severe and often unjust laws to regulate, but whose actual motive is to suppress all mediums, clairvoyants, etc., whether they tell the truth or not. Laws which impose an excessive privilege tax on a designated avocation, legally brand it as a crime. Here is something of more immediate importance than debating the details incident to a life beyond the grave.

Let all true Spiritualists zealously teach the people that there is a very marked contrast between a clairvoyant medium and a palmist, card reader, or a common fortune-teller. That many otherwise intelligent people regard the science of prophecy through spirit power, in the same light as any other method of clever imposition, is clearly evident from laws already in force, grimly proclaiming that many "wise men" in our halls of legislation make no distinction, and regard spirit mediums just as pernicious to the public welfare as are those arrogant frauds who never fail to advertise in glowing and seductive language in the daily papers that they alone have the miraculous gift of of revealing the future, and that they never fail if a given price is advanced, to banish troubles of all kinds from rich and poor.

This would not attract our notice did not these human vampires often seek to shield their heinous impositions beneath the name of Spiritualism. Here is another spot in the spiritual field which is badly in need of cultivation by our sincere writers and thinkers. Spiritualists should try and organize into a body under some permanent form solely for mutual protection. Let us create a sinking fund in order to cause the repeal of all laws which by means of excessive privilege taxes, unjustly class honest clairvoyant mediums with the arrogant impostors who constantly infest the principal cities of the United States. Spiritualists who favor this plan could easily contribute from ten cents to a dollar, which should be held in trust by some responsible party, said party to be nominated by a majority of those who have created the sinking fund.

I have merely sketched a rough outline of a subject which I would very much like to see agitated in The Progressive Thinker, for I have striven for many years to do my part toward setting spirit philosophy upon a permanent foundation. In view of these facts it is very evident that few genuine mediums have the courage to endure the scorn of a pitiless public which following the example set by the lawmakers seldom discriminates between a clairvoyant medium and a brazen fortune-teller. Spiritualism never pretends to go beyond the bounds of nature, and yet generally the first thing people do when they begin to study its philosophy, is to eagerly search for tests of a personal nature, often expecting through an immature medium, satisfactory answers to questions that would completely confound a deeply learned philosopher, Thus falsely regarding a clairvoyant as nothing more than a caterer to the whims of public curiosity. Spirit mediums should never forget that they are simply humble workers in a field of philosophy that will beyond a doubt eventually control the minds of the leading thinkers of the world.

A medium should ever strive to estimate the mortal world at its true value, and while they should always do everything possible toward alleviating the troubles incident to humanity, both mediums and healers should firmly impress upon the minds of the people, that it is unjust to censure them for exacting a reasonable income for their service. Money may be the indirect cause of a great amount of evil, yet in our present imperfect state of civilization no human being can exist without it.

Taking all minor facts into consideration I think it absurd for anyone to imagine that spirit philosophy can in any form flourish without the aid of money, and I think it only a matter of justice that mediums, and magnetic healers should be expected to receive a stipulated reward for their labor from each individual whom they benefit. This fee is only a just equivalent, and not a gift bestowed by a generous patron. I can not imagine how the public mind became imbued with the idea that Spiritualists should expend their time and labor for the good of the people, and not expect a just recompense in hard cash. To this emphatic assertion many professed Spiritualists are ready to exclaim, "Surely a grateful people will not forget to reward those who have taught them the realities of spirit life, or who have brought them out of many grievous troubles?"

To a certain limited extent this conjecture is based on truth.

But alas! the wretched and melancholy experience of many a faithful medium, and the sad self-sacrificing life of many a magnetic healer, painfully demonstrates the awful fact, that the much vaunted gratitude of the public toward its real benefactors, is either a pleasant myth, or has long since vanished into a dream of the past.

FROM THE N. S. A.

To the Editor and Readers of The Progressive Thinker—Dear Friends:—The N. S. A. is moving on with its good work, and is still receiving contributions to the Mayer fund. We are encouraged by the kindly words and contributions that come to this office from all parts of the country. Many of the donations are small, and can be but illy spared by those who so cheerfully send them, but they are all appreciated and we know that a blessing comes to the N. S. A. with them. The recent suggestion of Brother Cole, that the working people in our ranks send each a donation of twenty cents to this office for the Home, these contributions to be called a "Labor Fund," is meeting with good response, and we are daily receiving such contributions, for all of which the donors have our grateful thanks.

We trust that no one who has not given something to the Home fund, who reads these lines will refrain from doing so, we still need nearly three thousand dollars to fill the fund, even if every person who has pledged—and not yet paid—towards it, fully meets his or her obligation, therefore we trust that all friends of the cause, will do their part towards making this a success.

We have a donation of several hundred pretty booklets of poems to be sold for the benefit of the Home fund. The collection of poems is a worthy one that may grace any home, and please any lover of poetry. It is published by Mrs. H. Straub, of Syracuse, N. Y., in loving memory of her ascended son. The poems are not of a personal character, but are such as the utmost stranger to their author can find pleasure in. We sell these pretty booklets at 25 cents a copy, two cents extra by mail. They can be had at this office, and not only help the N. S. A. thereby, but also secure a gem for your homes, or as a gift to friends.

Washington, D. C.

Spiritualism in this city has had a successful and gratifying season of work. The First Association of Spiritualists closed its meetings for the season in Masonic Hall, Sunday evening, May 28. Notwithstanding the warmth of the evening, a large audience was in attendance. In response to appeals from the platform, a splendid collection was taken, and the society closed its season free from debt. The work of the year has been a good one, and reflects much credit upon President Wood, and his helpful co-operators. The association will reopen its meetings in October, and the outlook for another season of good and effective work for Spiritualism is promising.

The children's lyceum also closed its season on the above mentioned date; its success has been most pleasing, the loyal workers in this school have reason to be proud of their labors, and of the children they have encouraged to attend each week. The prospect for future good work in this direction is more than fair. An excursion and picnic to the lyceum is to take place down the river, June 2.

The Ladies' Aid has performed most excellent work, and made a success of its meetings and entertainments, it has turned a goodly sum into the treasury of the First Association, as a result of the faithful work of the ladies who constitute its membership. Its closing meeting for the season was held at the hospitable home of Mrs. Chapman, on the evening of May 31. After the business exercises, a season of social converse, and of entertainment was indulged in, during which Prof. Longley rendered one of his spiritual songs, and the messenger spirits of Mrs. Ferguson and Mrs. Longley voiced their greetings and sentiments to the company. The entertainment closed with a collation at the genial board of the hostess, of which the large number partook with appreciation and enjoyment, not forgetting to respond royally to the vote of thanks offered to the hostess for her hospitality by Mr. Wood.

A new Spiritual society has chartered with the N. S. A. in this city; its work is for the spread of Spiritualism. The local mediums are doing a grand work, among them are Mrs. Stephens, Mr. Altemus, Mrs. Wahneke, Victor Wylde and Mrs. Zoller. All are working for the good of humanity. The spirit world through its individual and intelligent messengers was never nearer the city of the nation, and its people than at present. We frequently hear of investigators among the congressmen, and others in official life. The inquiry is great, especially as to whether the departed live and can return to communicate with their friends.

is the intangible power that controls human destiny. It is the key to all business and social success. All truly great men and women are magnetic, they know how to win and hold people. This power does not come by chance, but it is an art, a science, depending upon certain fixed laws which everyone should understand. By our new system you can learn in a few days at your own home and not only achieve success yourself, but you can influence the minds, health and actions of others. We guarantee it. Our profusely illustrated treatise tells exactly how to acquire these marvelous powers. It is the most expensive and most comprehensive work of the kind ever published. It is from the pens of the world's most famous scientists. This wonderful book has been the means of bringing success, happiness and health to thousands of persons. A postal card will bring it. It's Free. Read the following convincing testimony, and write to-day.

Rev. Paul Weller, Box 220, Gorman, N. Y., says: "Your instructions have given me a power and a force of character I did not dream it was possible for me to acquire."

G. S. Lincoln, M. D., 101 Crutchfield Street, Dallas, Tex., writes: "The book was a revelation to me. Your methods are far in advance of any I have ever seen."

Miss Katherine Messinger, of Corry, Pa., says: "Your instruction has made a new woman of me. Possibilities have been opened up that I never dreamed had existed before. Everyone should understand your grand science, and there would be less misery, poor health, and unhappiness in the world."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

L. M., Oregon: Q. What is the cause of "red snow?"

A. Especially in high latitudes, and on mountains when the temperature rises above freezing, large areas of snow-surface become stained as with blood. The cause is the growth of a microscopic plant of the class of algae. It multiplies like the yeast plant by division and with astonishing rapidity. Its name is protoccus nivalis. There is a species P. viridis, or green protoccus, which is almost every where present, forming the green or greyish layers or granulations on rocks, fences and the shaded side of buildings. As the red protoccus is first green and changes its color under the influence of light, and moisture, there can be but slight difference between the two. Like all the lower forms of life, the germs are incomprehensibly numerous and everywhere diffused, hence their sudden appearance when the proper conditions arise is not as wonderful as it appears to those unacquainted with the life-process of these lower orders.

Sleeper: Q. How many hours of sleep are required?

A. One of the most wonderful phenomena of life is sleep. To think of the activities of the day falling into absolute rest, and the keenness of thought into unconsciousness simulating death. Yet on retirement at the usual hour, sleep is expected and without the least hesitation we resign ourselves to oblivlousness from which we expect to awake refreshed. The deprivation of food or water can be borne with less discomfort than the loss of sleep, for the activities of the body and mind cannot be continued for any unusual length of time without rest being demanded. The length of the day is sufficient to exhaust the energies and night is welcomed with the peaceful messenger it brings. Sleep comes as the restorer of strength; the sovereign remedy for the invalid; an anodyne for the tortured mind. The physical energy is reduced, and in the later hours of the night or early morning the blood is withdrawn from the surface, and circulation so diminished that the most florid become pale. The labor of the heart is reduced to a minimum, and that organ given rest, so much as possibly can be given to one which cannot for even a brief time pause in its labor. The brain receives a much less quantity of blood and practically the mind ceases to think.

In this state the waste and breakage of the day is repaired. New cells in muscle and nerve take the places of those broken down, and if the rest is perfect we arise refreshed, renewed and ready for the tasks of the new day.

How many hours are required for this rest? That depends on many circumstances. It depends on how weary the body and mind have become. The greater the strain, the more sleep required. Children require more hours than adults. A disturbed sleep often wearies instead of rests. A comfortable bed and pure air, fresh from the wide open window is conducive to dreamless sleep.

As an average eight hours' sleep is none too little, though many find that six is sufficient. Sleep before 5 o'clock in the morning is far more invigorating that after that hour. The negative condition of the midnight hours is the natural period of repose.

E. L. Sparrow: Q. Have any spirits reported on the condition of the popes in spirit life?

A. I have never seen or heard of a communication given by a spirit claiming to be a "pope of Rome," and according to well-known spiritual laws, such communication would be difficult if not impossible were not the medium a Catholic. The departed Catholics form an exclusive realm, with their great leaders in as dormant position as when on earth. Whatever influence these are able to exert, is made through the priests of their own church. Whenever communications have been from this source they have had for their intent to cast obloquy and disgrace on the medium and those connected. Several well-known mediums have received communications saying that there was a thoroughly organized body of Jesuitical spirits for the acknowledged purpose of overthrowing the labor of those engaged in its extension. Facts, voluminous in number and startling in suggestiveness, sustain this proposition. If a Spiritualist should receive a message purporting to come from a high dignitary of the Catholic church, he may feel positively assured that it is from a deceiving spirit.

A medium who is a true Catholic would be given only such impressions as the Catholic priesthood would allow.

Mrs. S. S. Rockhill: Q. Are spirits who passed away by violent deaths drawn to the place of the crime? If so cannot mediums, any sympathetic persons, go to such places and assist such spirits?

A. The legendary stories of haunted houses, and appearances of spirits where crimes have been committed, foster the belief that the spirit lingers around the last scene of its mortal life, when violently thrust therefrom. This is not by compulsion, nor is it always true. In fact the majority of those meeting with violent deaths at once go away, either with friends or by their attractions. Others who have no spirit friends, who have no place to attract them, enter spirit life, filled with regret, and revenge for the injustice which has deprived them of the enjoyment of life. They linger near the scene of their misfortune, and advance out of their peculiar condition with great difficulty. The idea that they can be reached only through and by mediums, is a strange error for one versed in the philosophy of Spiritualism to fall into. They may be awakened from the terrible hypnotism into which they have fallen, by coming into a circle. The true instructors of such "earth-bound" spirits are their spirit friends, or spirits who devote themselves to the work, with the zeal of missionaries and with much more intelligence and success.

"Mesmerist," Paris, France: Q. Dr. X. LaMotte Sage gives the following propositions on hypnotism. If true, then there need be no fear of anyone being made to do criminal acts by hypnotic influence and the fear in which it is held is groundless. What is the opinion of the Question Department?

"1. No one can be hypnotized against his will.

"2. No one can be hypnotized unless he complies with certain conditions, and does his part to bring about the state.

"3. Anyone who is hypnotized has done more himself to induce the state than the operator has done.

"4. The hypnotist possesses no special power, nor can he gain permanent control over any one, or absolute control even temporarily, without the subject's consent.

"5. To be hypnotized in no respect, shows a weakness, nor is the condition in any sense a pathological one.

"6. Hypnotism within itself is absolutely free from harm."

A. (1) It is undoubtedly true that while the will is active no one can be hypnotized. If the will is aroused the influence is gone. But the methods of the hypnotist are such as allay the will and gain control before it is called into activity. The pleasant manners, and soft words of the successful salesman disarm opposition; the magnetic orator directs attention away from the point he would gain until he brings it forward when the will has become passive.

If the subject understands that he can overcome any and all hypnotic influences by his will, he is in no danger of passing under such control. The danger lies in his not knowing, and more in not being aware of its being exercised, so as to guard against it.

(2) This proposition is quite true, and yet it should be modified, for the subject may comply, unconsciously to himself. If not well-informed as to the conditions and laws of control, he is certain to do so.

(3) It may be added that the subject may do even more, for he can become self-hypnotized, and thus do all for himself.

(4) To perform the first experiment the subject's consent would of course have to be gained, but after a few seances it would not have to be, for the suggestion might be made from one time to another.

(6) It may also be used for harm by those who are designing, if they have subjects ignorant of this power, and how to antagonize and throw it off.

VIRGILIUS MARO.

Striking Thoughts of an Old Latin Poet.

I have recently been indulging my fancy by re-reading Virgil.

Some thoughts are strikingly interesting now because of their analogy to modern Spiritualistic views. To read the poetical translations by Dryden and others, one loses the thought in the jingled metre of modern poetry. With the Latin Aeneid before me, I translate as nearly literal as possible. The scene is in Avernis. Anchises, the father (a ghost) is instructing the son who has been permitted to visit him there. Anchises proceeds: "In the first place a spirit within cherishes the heaven and earth and liquid plains and the shining orb of the moon, and Titanian stars; and intelligence diffused through their members moves the whole mass and mingles itself with the great body. Thence the race of men and of birds, and of flocks; and whatever monsters the sea produces beneath its marble surface. There is a fiery strength and heavenly origin to these first principles; so much so that destructive bodies do not clog them, nor earthy limbs and dying members do not blunt them." [I put the disjunctive nor for the conjunctive que, of the Latin.]

"Hence they fear and desire, grieve and rejoice." * * *[an exact parallel with modern spiritual ideas.]

"But also when life has left them with its last light yet not every impurity—nor all corporeal pollutions entirely depart from these unhappy creatures. It is entirely necessary for a long time that things compounded with the soul should cling (inolescere) to it in a wonderful manner. Hence they are exercised by punishments and they pay the penalties of their former sins." The lighter sins are expurgated by air—a higher or baser degree by water, but the most heinous only by fire.

I think the following worthy of observance, which I will give both in Latin and in English.

"Quisque suos patimur manes." I can easily conceive of slight variations in the translation of "manes" in the above. Surely the substantial meaning is: "Each one must suffer for his own wrong doing." True, this is not the exact meaning of "manes." Classical critics explain this word as signifying a kind of double personage belonging to each person, though separable therefrom, yet it subjects him to inflictions.

We are taught that in time, however, these sins are all washed out. Another spiritual analogy. But more like reincarnation we have the following which I translate literally: "When all these have rolled the wheel for a thousand years, God calls them to the Lethean stream in a great band so that unmindful [of the past] they might revisit the upper convex world—and again shall begin to wish to be restored to their bodies." Then Anchises points out to Aeneas various shades of future heroes who are to figure on earth. This is a very singular doctrine and I am not aware that it has any parallel anywhere. We have there the shades of Romulus, Marcellus, Caesar and various other ghosts who (according to the poet's fancy) are to figure upon earth in the future. I have written this article believing that these things in view of the teachings of Modren Spiritualism may possess something of renewed interest. The drinking from Lethe may throw light also on some modern "original thoughts." B. R. ANDERSON.

Camp in Colorado.

As the camp season is again drawing near, I thought perhaps a short letter in regard to a very pleasant one might be interesting to camp goers. The one of which I wish to speak is located in South Boulder Canyon in the lovely mountain regions of Colorado, some twenty miles from Denver, on the Colorado Southern railroad. The writer spent seven delightful weeks at this camp last season during the months of July and August. This camp with its surrounding beauties is all that heart could wish for. The lovely mountain scenery for which Colorado is noted, is well pictured in this particular place, and for this reason this chosen spot should and I trust will well patronized another season.

The originator of this camp is none other than Mr. George Taylor, of Denver, who, it has been well said, "knows a good thing when he sees it." He has purchased 480 acres to be used for the purpose of camping.

He with his estimable wife managed affairs last season, entertaining large crowds on Sundays, to the satisfaction of all. Those who came needing rest and quiet found it 'neath the shady nooks. Those who came seeking health and strength were after breathing the cool balmy mountain air, and drinking from each icy spring greatly benefited, and those who came begging spiritual food were amply provided for by what the very best developed mediumship gives, both in lectures and tests, and each left with a feeling of kindness and expressed hope and wish that Brother and Sister Taylor's untiring efforts might in the near future be crowned with glorious success.

When one is fairly inside the wall of this camp he imagines himself suddenly transplanted into the garden of Eden, and while standing in its center and his eyes gazing heavenward in the four different directions, he finds himself fairly shut in by four lovely mountain peaks beautiful beyond description, dotted here and there with the usual pine trees and the overhanging of craggy clefts of rock. And now to gaze downward he sees the little streamlet rushing by and with a listening ear its rush and roar mingled with the welcome warble of the birds is making music that would cease the sighing of the heart and cast cares away.

Rates at this camp:—A tent, cot and camp-stool for season, $10, of same with board, $5 per week. Any other information desired in regard to this interesting movement, may be obtained by writing May Taylor, Box 780 Denver, Colo. Camp opens July 1.

Ohio Spiritualists' Convention.

I suppose the public looks to me for some report of the convention which the Ohio Spiritualists' Association held at Columbus last week. This report has been necessarily delayed and curtailed because almost immediately on my arrival home from the convention, I was called to another part of the state on account of the serious illness of a relative.

The convention really opened on Tuesday evening, May 22, when the ladies of the First Spiritualist Church of Columbus tendered a reception to the state officers and visiting delegates. After many pleasant social amenities light refreshments were served and short but ringing speeches were made by nearly all of the distinguished guests of the evening.

Wednesday morning the convention was called to order by the president, Hon. E. W. Bond, who announced the various committees and the convention got right down to business without delay. The annual reports of the president and secretary contained numerous suggestions and recommendations which were referred to a special committee and some of which were subsequently the subject of much earnest debate. The full text of the various resolutions adopted I have not time to present now, but will try to present them in a later issue.

The election of officers for the coming year resulted as follows: President, Thos. A. Black, Cleveland; first vice-ident, W. V. Nicum, Dayton; second vice-president, C. H. Mathews, New Philadelphia; secretary, John C. Hemmeter, Cleveland; treasurer, Carrie Firth-Curran, Toledo. State delegates to the National convention to be held at Cleveland next October, Willard J. Hull, Columbus, and C. B. Gould, Cleveland; alternates, Zetta Lois Else, Galion, and Cora Folson, Columbus, O. The remaining members of the board of trustees elected were as follows: Hon. James B. Townsend, Lima; Mrs. E. A. Kibby, Cincinnati; Hon. E. W. Bond, Willoughby, and H. H. Baxter, Ashley. The convention closed its routine business at noon, Thursday, and the afternoon session was devoted to a general conference meeting which proved to be a "free-for-all" in the fullest sense of the term. At both evening sessions the people of Columbus packed the hall to the doors.

Wednesday evening addresses were delivered by Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., Hon. J. B. Townsend, the owner of the Light of Truth, and also by its editor, Willard J. Hull.

If the writer may be permitted to express his personal opinion he would say that President Barrett's address was noteworthy for its perfect diction and rhetoric, Mr. Townsend's for its earnestness, and Mr. Hull's for the dignified and emphatic manner in which he pleaded for greater toleration for new and advancing ideas. The principal address of the convention was delivered Thursday evening by Dr. J. M. Peebles, who held the large audience spellbound. Dr. C. H. Figuers acted as platform test medium both evenings.

In the business of the convention no one subject caused greater discussion than the recommendation of the secretary, that no professional medium should be elected to office on the executive board. The writer's record as a champion of mediumship is too well established to be questioned, but he maintained that the best interests of the association, the cause in general, and the mediums themselves, would be served by composing the entire board of representative men and women. The resolution was lost, and we need offer no further comment.

Probably no one at the convention was busier than Zetta L. Else, for in addition to having entire charge of the musical program, in which she was ably assisted by Miss Jennie DeLong, of Columbus, she acted as assistant secretary and journal clerk. In recognition of her exceptional ability as an artist, Mrs. Else has been appointed general musical director for the National Convention next October.

The thanks of the visiting delegates are due to the friends in Columbus who so generously opened their homes for our entertainment. The Daily Press of the city was also exceptionally courteous and liberal in its reports.

What Clairvoyants Saw in Boston.

To the Editor:—The arrest of "the negro seer" or clairvoyant for alleged robbery of money, etc., from an old lady near Boston, Mass., seems to make some people wonder if all clairvoyants are humbugs. If some State street or Wall street broker had taken this money for investment under similar circumstances, would they have been prosecuted? A case quite different from this Naganzi humbug is one occurring in Boston, and showing genuine clairvoyant vision, by Mrs. Adelaide C. Littlefield, of 218 Columbus avenue. A man says to the artist psychic: "I have a lock of hair in my pocket of a woman you never saw or heard of. I wish you would take the lock of hair and see if you can describe the character, size, age, complexion, etc., of its late owner." The medium said, "You need not hand me the lock of hair, because I can tell you all about her without even touching a hair of her head." This she proceeded to do perfectly without the common trance which some people think is necessary for such work. In another case the medium described a man's gold mine in the far West, telling the location of ores, buildings, workmen, etc. Such cases are very numerous and abound in the literature on these subjects. The often slurring manner which some people show by actions or otherwise, against clairvoyants, betrays their dense and lamentable ignorance of these grand phases.

Hypnotic subjects have repeatedly performed the most startling feats in clairvoyant visions; traveling by eyesight alone hundreds and thousands of miles in a moment's time, describing strangers, places and scenes totally unknown to anyone near them, and yet later proving to have been photographically and phonographically correct in all details. No greater crime is habitually committed against the people than the studied deliberate manner in which the clergy, etc., supplies all evidence and facts along these lines. People who desire to know the truth on these subjects can do no better than to read up the many books in the public libraries, etc., dealing on Spiritualism, psychical research, hypnotism, etc. Rev. Talmage, the noted divine, has had no blacker spot upon his brain than that one disclosed by his attack upon spirit mediums. This sermon shows that he is both ignorant and bigoted, not to call him by the names he deserves. Talmage generally is brilliant, honest and eloquent, but when he tackles the scientific occult, when he reviews the superb subject of Spiritualism, he becomes a donkey, a pigmy, an idiot and a clown, worthy of our pity that one so high would stoop so low.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

DEATH DEFEATED,

—OR—

The Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young,

BY J. M. PEEBLES, M. D., M. A., Ph. D.

It certainly is just what is needed as a book of good suggestions and instructions along the line of health. He treats the subject in his own matter-of-fact style. The book comprises a practical subject handled in a practical manner by a practical man. Even if people do not wish or expect to live here always, they should know how to live right and enjoy the life that belongs to them. This is undoubtedly the most useful book for the masses the Doctor has ever published, for it strikes at the root or cause of disease, and tells how to avoid it. 212 pages, cloth bound. Price, $1. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, And All Being.

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

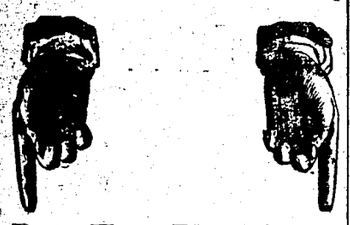
"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.



"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

TRUTH

The only way to find out who is the "Greatest Psychic Physician living" is to read what their patients say.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

never claims that he is the greatest physician living, or that he is the

GREATEST PSYCHIC.

He believes that there are hundreds of healers who are just as successful as he is, and he never yet has claimed that he is or was the best psychic, although twenty years before the public as the independent slate-writer with the record of not one person who ever accused him of fraud, ought to make the public THINK when they compare his claims to other so-called psychics.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

only desires those who are sick to remember that for over twenty years he has been before the public as a psychic, and over twelve years as a physician, and he never claims greater powers than others; but we believe he has a right to think he has as great gifts as those who claim so much.

Birthday Surprise.

At the residence of Mrs. A. Almquist, Grand Rapids, Mich., on the evening of May 25, 1900, was held by twenty of her numerous friends, one of the most delightful and unique surprise parties that I ever attended. Mrs. Stidd was the originator and principal executive of the affair. Mr. and Mrs. Dixon and your humble servant had called on Mrs. Almquist and were engaging her attention with a pleasant game of pedro, when the party, without any ceremony, broke in upon her. To say that she was surprised is putting it very mild, for she had not received the slightest intimation of the affair. There were the following, all staunch Spiritualists, as I remember: Dr. Elliott and his niece, Miss Tisdale, Mr. Hembling, Mrs. E. Blake, Mrs. Paine, Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Horton, Mrs. Kinney, Mr. and Mrs. Stidd, Mrs. Sanford, Mr. and Mrs. Dixon, Mr. and Mrs. Beals and myself. After holding a circle in which Mrs. E. Blake and Mrs. Paine gave some excellent tests and messages from spirit friends, also Mr. and Mrs. Horton gave some fine tests, giving names of visiting spirit friends, and Mrs. Beals' little guide, Sunlight, did some very clever work. Mrs. A. was presented with a large, beautiful rug, as a birth-day present; the presentation was made by Mr. Dixon in his usual happy manner. Mrs. A. was so overcome that she could only say 'thanks' through her smiles and tears. Music, visiting, and cake and coffee followed. It was a most delightful occasion, long to be remembered by its participants, who in the wee sma' hours of morning wended their ways homeward. B. F. SLITER.

OUR CAUSE.

None Need Be In Doubt as to What It Is.

In No. 547 of The Progressive Thinker appears a communication, "A Timely Warning," which is most admirably answered by the editor in the same number, and I wish to add an amen, and a few thoughts in line with the editorial. No Spiritualist who desires to understand what our cause is need be in doubt regarding the same; as to outsiders, they, too, can easily understand "our cause" if they will read our books and study nature. At the first spirit circle I ever attended, in 1852, in answer to my question, "What is the object of the spirits in establishing communion with the people of earth?" the answer was as follows: "To sever the chains of slavery, both physical and mental, which bind the millions of earth, and set them free from the galling bonds of priests and kings and teach them from the highest to the lowest to think for themselves." This was the creed I had been looking for. I embraced it, and have done what I could to spread this glorious doctrine of freedom of thought and speech.

Priests for centuries had held the masses in abject fear and slavery by the lying fictions they taught concerning the condition of men after death; the higher spirits were powerless against the ignorance and superstition of the innumerable hosts of the earth and the lower spheres of spirit life, but at last they broke through the wall of granite-like fog, and proclaimed to earth's children, "Behold we live! and we are children of nature and under her laws, just as you are, and just as we were on the earth sphere."

Oh, what a doctrine was this to orthodoxy; no literal burning hell, no psalm-singing heaven, no Jesus to save us from the effects of our murders, thefts, and other brutal sins; so orthodoxy has been bitterly fighting us on these lines for fifty-two years.

"Our cause" is to fight ignorance, bigotry, intolerance. "Our cause" is to build up truth in place of falsehood. "Our cause" is to establish love in place of hate and vengeance. "Our cause" is to establish knowledge in place of blind faith. "Our cause" is to make every man and woman an intelligent living soul, instead of an ignorant, beggarly slave.

"Our cause" is to prove to men their immortality through and by the eternal laws of nature, and thus give to them the greatest possible incentive to live lives of purity and usefulness, so that they may in the immortal spheres reap the natural reward of such noble lives.

There seems to be a desire on the part of some to wage the battle of infinite intelligence vs. common sense, all over again; but I think the large majority are agreed that it has been fought to a finish, and that common sense is the winner. Spiritualism stands for facts and looks upon fiction as upon the toys and vanities of childhood. Any effort to force it back into swaddling clothes will be in vain, and will result only in inharmony and strife. Onward, onward is our motto. Those who have recently joined the ranks must be content to stay in the rear guard, if they cannot keep pace with the main body and within hailing distance of the vanguard. B. F. FRENCH.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, on May 26, 1900, Thomas Dix, aged 40 years, native of England. Uncle Tom, as he was best known at Mrs. Tripp's circles, was beloved by all who knew him, as a kind-hearted man and a true Spiritualist. The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Rush, at Boydston Chapel, Forty-second and Cottage Grove avenue, at 3 p. m., Wednesday, May 30, 1900, to Oakwoods Cemetery. Silverdale, Staffordshire (England) papers please copy.

Passed to spirit life, April 24, 1900, from Winnebago City, Minn., Mrs. Rebecca Walker Carlton, aged 86 years and 18 days. When 14 years of age she united with the Methodist church, remained there until 1850, when she and her husband commenced the investigation of Spiritualism, and by that they were given a knowledge of the continuity of life. The husband crossed that beautiful river a few years ago, with the knowledge that they would meet again, and as she neared the borderland she saw sweet spirits around her. The knowledge she had gained from the spirit world was always freely spoken of to her friends for she felt she had truly found the "pearl of great price." Her many friends attended the services and testified of their love by their words of sympathy and floral offerings. While her children and grandchildren will mourn her visible presence they know she is with them. It was by her expressed wish that the writer was called to officiate at the service as the glad spirit had ascended to be with loved ones gone before, and the body was given back to Mother Nature. Her children all rejoice in the truths of Spiritualism, one daughter being a fine medium. MRS. S. M. LOWELL.

Anoka, Minn.

Passed to spirit life, March 18, 1900, Mrs. Fannie Newell, wife of W. P. Newell, of Malmo, Neb. She was a staunch Spiritualist and leaves a husband and two small children. She was also a medium of fine development. Services were conducted by Mrs. Carrie L. Bean, of Lincoln, Neb.

A TRUE HEALER

He Brings Health and Strength to Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

SCIENCE TRIUMPHS OVER DISEASE.

DR. PEEBLES, noted the world over as a physician and scientist, is performing some of the most remarkable cures the world has ever seen. His fame has become world-wide on account of these marvelous cures. He has patients in every state in the Union and in many foreign lands who stand ready to testify to the wonderful cures he has made of cases that had been treated by many of the most eminent physicians without success. Many of the Doctor's patients are those who had traveled all over the world, visiting all the great health resorts and sanitariums in a Futile Search for Health and strength. They returned home in despair, thinking there was no hope for them, when they were persuaded to write to Dr. Peebles for a diagnosis. This was so clear and complete, showing a thorough understanding of the case that it inspired enough hope to induce them to try, as a last resort, a course of his treatment. Many such cases show wonderful improvement from the start. A very few months is sufficient in almost all cases to complete a perfect cure. Mrs. L. A. Humbel, of Long Pine, Neb., who was given up with dropsy and kidney disease by the best physicians in the country says: "I am very grateful for what you have done for me, as I am in better health than I have been for five years. I have gained fifteen pounds, and I am getting stronger every day. Last month I visited my aged mother in Iowa. She was greatly rejoiced for she never expected to see me alive again. For five years I travelled and doctored with the best physicians, finally gave up in despair, and went home to my sister, as I thought to die. I can never express how thankful I am for what you have done for me."

Remember that Dr. Peebles does not cure by Christian Science, Mesmerism, or any other "ism," but employs mild but potent remedies in connection with his wonderful Psychic Treatment. These Psychic Treatments, say his patients, "seem as a breath of higher life." If you do not fully understand the Psychic Science and these Psychic Treatments which are such a wonderful aid in the treatment of chronic and obscure cases, the Doctor will send you his essay, "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease," which will explain to you fully Psychic Diagnosing and Psychic Treatment with other valuable information for the sick. There is no one so capable of writing on this subject as Dr. Peebles, for he has investigated it for over a half century, and is a recognized authority on the various occult sciences in Europe as well as in this country.

All of Dr. Peebles' diagnosing is done by the aid of his psychic gifts. He can read the diseased conditions of the body as accurately as if each organ and tissue were open to his view. Out of many thousands of cases he has diagnosed during the past few years, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of each thousand are willing to testify to the marvelous accuracy of the diagnosis. Do you know your exact condition? Have you suffered for years without getting permanent help? Did the physician who treated you fully understand your case? Why will you be experimented upon by those who do not really understand your case when Dr. Peebles can diagnose your case perfectly and thus administer treatment upon a scientific basis? Why will you take patent medicines which are prepared for a "text-book" case, and which at best give only Temporary Relief, when you can secure treatment from this EMINENT HEALER that is Especially Prescribed and Suited to your case, at a very little more cost? These are the questions that interest all those suffering from chronic and obscure troubles. Think them over carefully. If you are sick and discouraged don't delay one moment in writing the Doctor for a diagnosis of your case. There is nothing of more importance to you than the condition of your health. It will cost you nothing to learn this. The Doctor will send FREE OF COST a complete diagnosis of your case and also his essay "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease" and valuable literature on chronic diseases and testimonials from some of his cured patients, showing the long list of so called incurable cases which he has cured. No disease is really incurable if perfectly understood. Every effect or diseased condition has its cause and if these are understood they can in almost every case be removed. When this is done permanent recovery is the result. DO NOT DESPAIR if you have failed to get permanent help, but write at once. Remember that DR. PEEBLES HAS CURED HUNDREDS WHERE ALL OTHERS HAD FAILED. Write him an honest letter, giving full name, age, sex and leading symptom in your own handwriting and he will give you a complete and full diagnosis and will also send the literature as mentioned above. Write today.

The South Chicago True Spiritualist Society meets every Sunday evening at 7:30 at 8927 Exchange avenue, instead of Elgeman's Hall.

The Chicago Liberal Society is a non-sectarian association for the encouragement of morality, the promotion of education, the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge, and the inculcation of truth in the place and stead of error and superstition. The Temple services of the society are held every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, 17th floor, and are in charge of Thomas B. Gregory. You are cordially invited to attend the same.

Send in notice of meetings held on Sunday at public halls.

Bear in mind that only meetings held in public halls will be announced under the above head. We have not space to keep standing notices of meetings held at private residences.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim is faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

ASTRAL WORSHIP.

By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Ann Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of it in general."—Buchner.

EVOLUTION AND THE PSYCHIC SENSE

Philosophical Thoughts on the Wonderful Universe of Mind and Matter.

One of the greatest disadvantages under which the materialist labors in his investigation of Spiritualism and kindred subjects, is the inability to conceive of an unseen reality, or actual existence, which makes no impression whatever upon the physical senses. In this type of mind, the materialistic, the belief that all real existence is necessarily known to man, that the five senses put him in relation with all that is, is hard to eradicate.

"How can there be a spiritual world?" is the question that is forever coming up. "What is it? Where is it? How did it come to be? What is it made of, and under what conditions do its inhabitants exist?"

A mind of this type regards the existence of an unseen universe as impossible, because to him incomprehensible, forgetting that the existence of the material world is likewise incomprehensible; that it has not yet been explained; that we do not know what it is, nor how it came to be, nor why; that it is a mystery as great and unsolvable to-day, as when the rude, savage, half-animal progenitors of man first gazed at the stars with dim wonder as to what those shining points of light might be.

Because we have some little acquaintance with material things, we are apt to think that we understand them, when in reality we know nothing whatever of their nature or origin. We cannot explain the existence of the simplest thing with which we are familiar. A grain of sand is as inscrutable in its nature and origin, as the solar system. Its tiny being is the manifestation of a substance and a force which the wisest philosopher will strive in vain to comprehend. Nothing is so baffling, so unspeakably tantalizing, as the mystery which lies back of all physical phenomena, forever mocking our weak and futile efforts to comprehend. Here they lie, within touch, and under our very eyes, yet we cannot so much as understand why a leaf-bud unfolds, or why moisture globes itself in a dew-drop. It will be time enough to demand an explanation of the unseen world when we have expained the existence of this one. The one is no more a mystery than the other.

Passing from outer existence to the life of man—what do we know of that? Take man first as a mere animal. Do we know just how this wonderful piece of mechanism, the physical organism, came to be as it is, and why? Do this, explain how all the bodily organs were fashioned to work in such perfect harmony, and there remains a yet more wonderful thing to be explained—the man himself, the mind. Do we know what mind is? how it came into existence and why? when and where in the dim past it had its origin? Will our materialist friend tell us what consciousness is? what intelligence is? what thought and sensibility may be? where these things came from and how they came?

If we stand here in the presence of an embodied intelligence, which we perceive exists, but the real nature of which we can neither explain nor understand, the real cause of whose existence is wholly unknown to us, need we marvel or deny the existence of a disembodied intelligence, simply because the ethereal form in which it is clad is not perceptible to our physical sense? Is the existence of an unseen intelligence any more wonderful, any more of a mystery, any more incomprehensible than that of the intelligence whose bodily presence we perceive and with whom we speak face to face?

When every moment of our lives we are dealing with existences, material and spiritual, the real nature and cause of which we know nothing, it behooves us to be a little modest in our assertions of what may and may not be possible in the realm beyond the senses.

The physical senses of man, what are they and how have they been developed? Take the sense of sight. Time was on this earth when the existence of light was unknown to any living thing. Light existed, the sun shone as now, but there was no eye to behold it. There was life upon the earth and in the sea, but the sense of sight was undeveloped.

Light is a force, and being comparatively constant in its operations, cannot but work effects in organic matter, a substance peculiarly sensitive to the action of incident forces, and for this reason extremely liable to transformation. Why those changes which resulted in increasing sensitiveness to light were imitated in certain parts of physical organisms, we cannot say. The question of localization was doubtless a mooted point for ages, and finally settled by the survival of the fittest. But a condition of sensitiveness once acquired would be transmitted and increased—a change once set up in organic matter, becomes a cause of further change, by reason of the transformation of forces—until after countless centuries, we have the rudimentary eye, which was just able to distinguish the difference between the densest shade and the most brilliant sunlight, transformed into the seemingly perfect organ possessed by man and the higher animals.

What has taken place? Simply a long series of modifications in organic matter, by means of which the inner consciousness has been made aware of outer reality, or as Herbert Spencer would say, "by which "internal relations" have become adjusted to "external relations."

The point to bear in mind is this, that the external relations, the outer reality, existed long before the organism became developed to that degree that the vibrations known as light could reach the inner consciousness and produce the impressions which we call sight.

What is true of sight is true of the other physical senses. They have been developed from a general condition of sentiency in primordial life-forms, far back in the dim past, through countless generations, to their present seemingly perfect state. Is a still higher state of development possible, or have the five senses reached the limit of development? Do they put us in relation with, or make us aware of, all external physical reality? The scientist will tell you no. He will tell you there are colors we do not see, sounds we do not hear, odors we cannot detect; that there is a wide range of existences of which they give us no knowledge whatever; that it is just possible that all we know of the physical universe is insignicant compared with that which lies beyond the power of the senses to grasp. If this be true of the merely physical universe, if after centuries of adaptation and development, the mind of man knows so little of actual physical existence, what must be true of that finer and more ethereal universe which we call the spiritual? If we are blind and deaf and wholly insensible to real physical existences, which lie all about us, what must be our condition in regard to spiritual realities? With the limitations of the physical senses made plain to our understanding, how dare we assert the impossibility of any existence beyond the range of these imperfect organs?

As the five senses of man have put him in partial relation with outer physical realities, so now there is dawning in him another sense, or power, or susceptibility, which is bringing him a knowledge of spiritual realities. The development of the psychic sense is simply another and higher stage in the endless process of evolution, another step in the process by which "internal relations are becoming adjusted to "external relations." The psychic sense, like the rudimentary eye in primordial life forms, is still in the early stages of development, but already it is giving man dim glimpses of a hitherto unknown reality. Just as the vibrations which produce light and sound existed before there was an eye or an ear to receive them, so has the spiritual universe existed prior to the development in man of a sense sufficiently refined to receive its more ethereal vibrations. The universe of matter and spirit is not limited by our ability to comprehend it. That which we know of real existence, is doubtless but a drop compared with the boundless ocean of that which is.

In that invisible, intangible, imponderable substance called the ether, doubtless are millions of existences as real as the solid earth on which we tread, yet imperceptible to the physical senses of man. The ether—what is it? We call it a fluid because it penetrates and fills matter as water fills a sponge; behaves toward matter, in fact, as though matter had no existence. It seems to us like an exceedingly rarefied substance, and so it is when compared with matter; but it is just possible that it exists under more than one form, that it exists under three states similar to the solid, liquid and gaseous states of matter. Why should it not? It is so refined and rarefied in its nature that the densest ether would behave toward matter as a fluid, and would so appear to us. A whole universe might be built of this substance, fashioned in a manner similar to the material universe, and be just as real as our physical earth, sun, and stars, and yet be all unknown and invisible to us. One of these ethereal worlds might lie close to ours, penetrating and wrapping our old earth round with its finer substance and yet we would know it not!

Of course this is mere speculation and must be taken for what it is worth. But why should the existence of such a universe, thus inhabited, be any more wonderful or incomprehensible than the universe of mind and matter, which we know exists, and whose existence we cannot in the least understand nor explain?

The spiritual universe may be composed of some substance infinitely more refined than the ether; but that it is composed of some kind of substance there can be no doubt. It cannot be made of nothing. And while we call it spiritual substance to distinguish it from matter, it is after all purely material. Only that is spiritual which pertains to spirit.

And this same spiritual substance, so-called, may be a first cousin to matter, for aught we know. We speak of matter as existing under the three states of solid, liquid and gaseous, because these three are all that are known to us. It is just possible that there may be a fourth state, or a fifth, of which we know nothing, for the reason that we have as yet no sense that puts us in relation with this kind of existence. It is just possible that matter exists under numerous forms unknown to us, that its higher and finer gradations constitute not one but many unseen universes, yet all built of one substance, under varying degrees of fineness and ethereality. "The universe is made of one stuff," said Emerson, long ago; and science will one day demonstrate the truth of that which came to his prophetic mind as an intuition.

Because we cannot transform the coarser into the finer, because we cannot resolve the so-called material into the so-called immaterial, as we resolve a solid into a liquid, or a liquid into a gas, is no reason for denying the possibility of such transformation, nor of the unity of substance of the tangible and the intangible.

In vain do we strive to grasp the magnitude of that which lies beyond the range of the five senses. The imagination staggers in its attempt to realize the vastness of the unseen universe, and the possibilities of growth and unfoldment which it offers to the spirit of man. "We stand on tiptoe to foresee the future," but it stretches away, realm beyond realm, far beyond the range of our vision, into the unlimited and the unknown.

"Still there lies
An outer distance, when the first is hailed;
And still forever yawns before our sight
An utmost—that is veiled."

RELIGION--WHAT IS IT?

Is It Definable? Naught but Superstition.

Religion is defined in Webster's Dictionary as follows:

"Latin, religio, either from relegere, to gather or collect again, to go through or over again in reading, in speech, or in thought; relegens, revering the gods; or from religare, to bind anew or back, to bind fast.

"1. The recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience; right feelings toward God as rightly apprehended; piety."

This is from the latest edition revised and enlarged by Drs. Goodrich and Porter. Old Noah Webster, who died in 1847, embodied in his definition "the practice of all moral duties," but he took pains to add that "the practice of moral duties without a belief in a divine law-giver, and without reference to his will, is not religion."

The revisers modified this as follows: "As distinguished from morality, religion denotes the influences and motives to human duty which are found in the character and will of God, while morality describes the duties to man, to which true religion always influences."

Thus the revisers sought to dodge the question whether morality alone is in any sense religion.

And now we have in the Century Dictionary numerous definitions of religion, to-wit:

"Religion: reverence toward the gods, fear of God, piety, conscientious scrupulousness, religious awe. conscientiousness, exactness; origin uncertain, being disputed by ancient writers themselves; (a) according to Cicero, relegere, go through or over again in reading, speech or thought; (b) according to Servius, Lactantius, Augustine and others, and to the common modern view, religare, bind back, bind fast, as if 'obligation' etc.

"1. Recognition of and allegiance in manner of life to a superhuman power or superhuman powers, to whom allegiance or service are regarded as justly due.

"2. The healthful development and right life of the spiritual nature as contrasted with that of the mere intellectual and social powers.

"3. Any system of faith in and worship of a divine Being or beings; as the Christian religion, the religion of the Jews, Greeks, Hindus or Mohammedans.

"4. The rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and ceremonies.

"5. The state of life of a professed member of a regular ministerial order.

"6. A conscientious scruple; scrupulosity (obs. or provincial.)

"7. Sense of obligation; conscientious sense of duty."

Some of these definitions eliminate the idea of worship or any reference to a Deity. And I could quote various definitions given by freethinkers, all eliminating belief in a divine law-giver or reference to his will, which old Noah Webster declared to be the essential element of religion.

The word religion (Greek threskeia) occurs only three times in the Bible, as follows:

"After the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee."—Acts xxvi:5.

"If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, that man's religion is vain.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world."—James 1:26, 27.

In Galatians 1:13, 14, the Greek word translated "Jews' religion" is Ioudaismos.

The definition of religion in James 1:27 is manifestly that of a monk; it says nothing about the worship of God and is therefore imperfect.

And Cicero's definition, "to read over and again," is still more monkish. Nor is the "binding back" definition at all satisfactory.

The practice of morality seems to be a modern addition to religion. The expression "religion of humanity," first used by Thomas Paine, the Deist, has become the shibboleth of the Unitarians. Is not humanity alone sufficient?

The Reverend Theodore Parker maintained that the religious element was the strongest in the republic of human faculties. He called himself a Theist and addressed the Deity as "Our Father and our Mother." But he made a jest of orthodox piety, pronouncing it "u'paiety."

Public prayer is the dominant element in all religious organizations. But Jesus denounced it and enjoined only secret prayer. Nor did he ever make a public prayer or keep a Sabbath day.

Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary gives eight definitions to religio—one more than the Century Dictionary. Number seven is "superstition." That I conceive to be the sum of religion in its last analysis, and the less we have of it the better.

THE DEVIL.

The devil doesn't go about with a mask fixed o'er his eyes;
He never puts on anything intended to disguise;
The devil never steals around in search of people he May catch red-handed in their sins or turn from probity;
The devil never stalks abroad—he has no time to roam
Around in search of victims—he's kept busy right at home.

The devil never lies in wait where righteous people fare,
To pounce upon them unawares and drag them to his lair;
He does no roaring through the land by day or in the night
To throw obstructions in the way of men whose aims are right;
The devil's far too busy for such practices, God wot, Attending to the crowds that flock down to him all unsought!

PROPHETIC JACKASS

And His Wonderful Revealments.

ANOTHER "NEW" LINCOLN STORY—IT WAS FIRST TOLD TO REBUKE THREE HUNGRY OFFICE-SEEKERS WHO HAD AROUSED THE PRESIDENT'S IRE.

Colonel R. S. Lawrence of Washington, who as a boy sat upon the lap of Abraham Lincoln in the 40s, makes an interesting contribution to the archives wherein are gathered the countless anecdotes and quaint stories for which the immortal Lincoln was so famous.

When Mr. Lincoln was President he was visited by three influential Indiana politicians. These gentlemen were gunning for spoils, and with a view of relieving the President of routine toil had thoughtfully prepared their "slate" and duly subscribed to its provisions. One gentleman—a resident of Indianapolis—was listed for postmaster; another hankered to be United States Marshal; the third would be content should the ermine of a federal judgeship fall gently upon him.

The politicians, having been presented to the President, indulged in a few commonplace remarks, then unwrapped their "slate" and placed it before the Chief Executive with a calm assurance.

Mr. Lincoln received their overtures with his customary complacency, remarking that the applications would be promptly filed, together with subsequent letters and indorsements, with the department under which each properly belonged, and while the three men from Indiana were yet struggling to regain their feet, the President, in his blandest style, observed that the incident recalled a story he had once heard and, without waiting for a request, proceeded to unfold the tale.

It appears that an Oriental potentate maintained upon the royal payrolls a functionary known as the Imperial Wise Man. It devolved upon this wise man, among other things, to forecast and prophesy, heading off dire probabilities, and placing his sovereign in possession of valuable advance information.

Upon a certain occasion the potentate gave notice to the Imperial Wise Man that it was desired to indulge in a royal hunt, and consequently important to ascertain accurately the prospective climatic conditions. The wise man retired for a couple of hours, during which time he consulted numerous charts and maps and made many figures and calculations, finally appearing before his Majesty with a well-defined prophecy: the weather would be propitious during the ensuing three days.

Thereupon the potentate, with his lords and ladies and heralds and a retinue of servants, all clad in gorgeous apparel, gold trappings, and fine linen, set forth toward the hunting preserves, some hours distant. Along about noon, when perhaps half the distance had been accomplished, the royal cavalcade suddenly came upon a jackass plodding along, bearing upon his back a peasant in coarse raiment. The countryman, perceiving the evidences of royalty, quickly slipped from the back of the jackass, and, prostrating himself in the dust, said:

"Most noble and august potentate, return without delay to your castle; a mighty storm is about to fall upon you, and your purple robes and fine linen and magnificent trappings and those of your lords and ladies and suite will be ruined and you will be drenched to the skin; return at once, O King, return."

The King and his court beheld a cloudless sky and laughingly proceeded on their way, while the servants mercilessly gibed at the poor countryman, who desisted not in his protestations. Within an hour a terrific storm arose; rain fell in torrents, and the wind blew with great violence, and, being without shelter, the King and his lords and ladies and servants were soaked to the skin and their fine trappings and rich apparel utterly ruined. Crestfallen and in bedraggled garments they put back to the castle with all speed.

The wise man was called before his King and made a sorry mess of his explanation. Of course, he was discharged and narrowly escaped with his neck.

Thereupon the potentate summoned the countryman who had foretold the storm, informed him he might consider himself duly initiated as Imperial Wise Man, and made the appointment public by special proclamation. The peasant received his appointment in a dazed sort of way, escaped from the royal presence in rather bad form, drew his stipend regularly thereafter, but made no drafts upon his occult powers.

One day, some weeks later, the King called the wise man to his chamber, and administered a mild rebuke to the latter for his failure to prognosticate, asking him, incidentally, what he supposed he was drawing a fat salary for?

The peasant protested that he could not measure up to such responsibility; that he couldn't prophesy fifteen minutes ahead on the weather or anything else, and then and there tendered his resignation to take immediate effect.

"But did you not foretell accurately the terrible storm that drenched the royal party and ruined our trappings and best clothes?" inquired the King.

"O, no, mighty King," responded the peasant, "it was not I who foretold the storm, it was the jackass. He it is who, by some mysterious gift of discernment, is able to foretell the storm, and in token thereof he has a peculiar way of folding back his ears. I merely voiced to your Majesty in words what my faithful jackass expressed to me in his own picturesque and silent way."

Wherupon the countryman's resignation was accepted, the jackass was duly installed as Imperial Wise man, and a royal decree to this effect was sent forth.

"And would you believe it," observed President Lincoln, with a sly twinkle in his eye, "as soon as that proclamation became public every jackass in the kingdom wanted an office."

SPIRIT PICTURE.

Peculiar Photographs of a Mirage.

If there is space to devote to it, I should be pleased to give credit to one of the noble veteran workers for a fine piece of work well and kindly done, which may not be uninteresting to the many thoughtful readers of the ever-welcome Progressive Thinker, who diligently scan its pages for every ray of light upon which at least a hope may be based that the allwise creative plan is grander, broader and deeper than the children of earth, yet in the infant class of the school of progressive unfoldment, have been able to grasp or comprehend.

The mortal side of my story will relate to that grand unfolded soul, and spirit artist, Wella P. Anderson. In 1893 I sent a communication to this paper which attracted his attention, and brought a letter from him that required answer, which in turn brought a letter from him in which he says in part, "There is a very beautiful ancient spirit—a lady of about 24, I should say—comes with your letter. She is a bright, beautiful spirit and is much interested in you. If you have a good reliable medium in your city whom you can consult, please do so, and ascertain if she is a guide of yours. If so, we will send a picture of her to you as a gift from her; there will be no charges on it, and you can accept it with our compliments."

This letter was signed Wella P. Anderson, Spirit Artist, and its reading set every fiber of my being aglow, for it contained corroborative testimony, having already heard of this spirit friend through Mrs. C. Cornelius, a sensitive at that time stopping here.

Personally, I need no further evidence of the fact that it is a great mistake to talk of people as dead. No, friends, we don't die when we kick out of the old shell; we simply receive our spirit birth. This is Bible doctrine, first-class common sense, and oceans of satisfaction. In connection with this, it is well to remember that the teaching of the forgiveness of sins is also a terrible fallacy. As we sow, so shall we reap, is Bible teaching again; there is no mistaking its meaning, and who will deny its clear-cut justice? Therefore, salvation, that is, heavenly conditions, comes only to each one as we work it out for ourselves, and it will be much sweeter thus earned, than to try to sneak into any sort of a heaven by the atoning blood, anguish and suffering of any one. For this digression you had better blame my angel friend; having passed through the mill, she knows somewhat about it, and is very anxious that we should fully realize that spiritual advancement depends on our own properly directed efforts.

So I firmly believe that my kind friends, though living far apart, have really told me the truth about this angel's visits, and why should I not believe it? The Bible testifies to angels' visits, and as the God we have heard so much about is just as kind, loving and obliging to-day as ever, there isn't the slightest reason to doubt the fact that the same blessed privilege is extended to them to this day. So, when a picture of this messenger from on high was promised me, my cup of gladness came mighty near being filled. It was promised as soon as conditions should be right. That took nearly seven years, and I think I could tell the reason why, but space is too valuable. Suffice it to say, that the picture was made this new year, and came safely to hand, free of all charges, even the expressage being prepaid. It therefore seems to have been solely a labor of love from a total stranger, for which I shall ever be grateful. And wonders to relate, the work of art that has been sent me, I can as readily see how it is possible to be alive after they say we have died, as to understand how such a piece of art work can be executed by a No. 2 Faber lead pencil. It is on heavy drawing paper, 22 by 32 inches in size, half-length figure standing, and therefore about life size. I dare not hazard a guess as to how long it would take a first-class artist to duplicate it, and think it would interest your many readers if the kind artists would send you a statement in regard to it, for there are not so many of to-day who are familiar with the beautiful art sketches of Wella P. Anderson and his guides. But they should be.

And now, if there is space, I have a few words to say touching the Question and Answer department. That grand man, Mr. Hudson Tuttle, long may he live to shed his brilliant light into the dark places. Though seemingly a walking encyclopedia, he cannot be expected to cover everything to perfection. There was a question some time ago about the picture of a mirage in Alaska, to which permit me to say: In the summer of 1889, I think, brother and I were in Juneau. Having a photo outfit along, we came in contact with an old prospector who had dabbled somewhat in photography. Among other things he showed two negatives, 8 by 10 plates, that he said he had taken of a mirage or reflection in the sky. The first plate shows a fine park in the foreground, lawn, trees, seats, etc.; back of that we see buildings, some in course of construction, plainly showing the staging. The second plate is the same except that the unfinished buildings are finished and staging removed. The second plate, I think he said, was taken one year later; the pictures are rather flat, being overtimed and developed, but being only an amateur, it is a wonder that he got anything, for he freely admitted that he labored under a heavy pressure of excitement at the time. He was rather jealous of the plates, but permitted us to make a print from one of them, which I still have. I think he stated that it was in the vicinity of Mt. St. Elias that he first saw it, and that it can only be seen for a short time on a certain day in the month of June, if the weather is right, and the question that presents itself by this time is, where is the original?

MRS. NELLIE C. MOSIER.

Narrow Escape from Being Buried Alive.

HER SON NOTICED THE EVIDENCE OF LIFE.

To the Editor:—The following special dispatch to the Cincinnati Enquirer, I clipped from May 30th issue of that paper, which no doubt will be of interest to many readers of The Progressive Thinker. Mrs. Mosier is one of our best and most reliable test mediums, whose friends in the ranks of Spiritualism are numbered by the thousand:

"Toledo, Ohio, May 29.—George B. Lawrence, of this city, returned from Cleveland, where he was called last Monday week by a telegram to attend the funeral of his mother, Dr. Nellie C. Mosier, of that city. Mr. A. C. Lawrence, of New York, who is prominent in theatrical circles, a second son, was also in attendance. It was announced that the mother had died from a sudden attack of heart failure. When the two sons arrived they found their mother laid out for burial and everything in readiness for the funeral which was arranged to take place Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Mosier is not dead, but came very near being buried alive.

"In speaking of the strange occurrence Mr. Lawrence to-day said that while his step-father, brother and himself were in the room all alone with the supposed corpse at 1:15 Tuesday morning they discovered the horrible mistake which came near being made. The first sign of returning consciousness was noticed by himself when he saw his mother's eyelashes quiver. He says he became so excited that he could not speak. All he could do was to point with his finger toward his mother's face.

"Mr. Lawrence says that his mother told him since that she was conscious all the time of what was going on about her of the preparations for the funeral and every other detail, but was unable to move or speak. His mother is still very weak, but is on the road to complete recovery.

"Mr. Lawrence says that his mother always has had a horror of being prematurely buried, a fate which, it is said, befell her sister. He also says that his mother's supposed remains were viewed by a number of physicians, as she had many friends in the profession of which she is a member, and not one of them noticed anything in her appearance different from that of a dead person."

Thus it has again been demonstrated that the majority of the know-all-M. Ds. (the old school of, course) know but little outside of the doping of humanity with a thousand and one poisonous drugs, and through their ignorance of nature's laws, thousands of people have been buried alive. That Mrs. Mosier's body escaped so sad a fate will be gratifying news to her friends who are legion, and specially will it be true of the managers of Lake Brady who have engaged Mrs. Mosier for most of the season of 1900. Now that her body has escaped so sad a fate we sincerely hope she will rapidly recover and ere long enjoy her former good health, so that on Sunday, July 1, the opening day of the assembly meetings at Lake Brady, the angel world, through her as their instrument, will deliver many grand and consoling messages to those who are present that day.

THE SONG OF THE WOMAN.

They'll never have done with fightin'
on land an' over sea;
Government—government, what does it care—what does it care for me?
Bugles must blow an' flags must wave,
an' the muffled drums must beat,
An' what to a lass is a lover when they lay him dead at her feet?

They'll never have done with the fightin'. Forward the columns sweep;
I hear the shout o' the captains as I tend the hearth an' weep.
Far off an' faint—but I hear it; an' a white, dead face I see Under the sod in the grave that God an'
government makes for me!

His hair was like the raven's wing. (I joy that my lips have prest,
As it fell in its flowing beauty, this dark lock on my breast!)
An' his brave, bright eyes looked love to mine—they I shall never see Till God at the great white Judgment day shall give him back to me.

Bible they've got for battles: For men have fought an' died
Ere the Prince of Peace said strife should cease—the prince that they crucified.
Though a woman's tears bedew the years, shall they stay the crimson tide?
What can you do with government with Bible on its side?

Men must fight the battles; lover an'
lass must part;
But what is a star of glory to a woman's broken heart?
Government's right, they tell me, an'
the wrong must righted be;
Give the lass then to her lover—an' my dead love back to me!

MY BENEDICTION.

Give more than you take,
Spend less than you make,
Ask less than you lend,
And be all men's friend,
And so may peace attend thee.

Know more than you say,
Act more than you pray,
Love more than you hate,
And with patience wait,
And so may grace commend thee.

Smile more than you frown,
Build and not tear down,
Be pure, just and strong,
Do good and hate wrong,
And so may love defend thee.

EVOLUTION.

Some Facts in Reference to It.

Rev. W. L. Pickard, Cleveland, Ohio—Dear Sir: In your sermon yesterday as reported by the daily papers, you are made to say, among other things: "A little girl passing the monkey cage in Gordon Park said to her parents, 'Just think, people have descended from these miserable things.'" This statement was an insult to the teachers of Cleveland and elsewhere. I am inclined to the belief that the child was joking and the shudder was assumed, for no one with sense believes that Darwin ever taught anything of the kind, and if any do believe it, it would justify the belief that at least some people had monkeys for ancestors, whether Darwin taught it or not.

Misrepresentation from the pulpit ought to be a serious matter. This monkey business is an old fossilized falsehood, promulgated principally by the clergy to hoodwink their dupes, and I am surprised that you got caught in its meshes.

I challenge you or anyone else to show that Darwin ever taught it, and I will say that if teachers teach that he did, they certainly are unfit for the positions they occupy. Darwin's theory of evolution (founded, by the way, on long years of careful investigation and hard work) in regard to the origin of species, was simply that all animal life was at one time the same thing. It might be illustrated in this way: "A" cuts down an oak tree from which he makes hitching posts, chairs, tables, book cases, etc. While there is a vast difference in appearance, yet all came from the same source; in one case, nature takes ages and ages to do its work; in the other it is done by the ingenuity of man in a short space of time. The hitching post was never a book case and the book case was never a hitching post, and it is the same in regard to the above theory—a man was never a monkey, and a monkey will never become a man. Darwin's theory is the only rational explanation of the differences in species of the same kind, including man. Climatic influence had a wonderful effect upon both animal and vegetable life, but it would take many centuries to make a marked change.

Do you really think it broadens the intellect of children to teach them that God created the world out of nothing in 144 hours; that a snake literally talked to good old Mother Eve in the Garden of Eden, or that Balaam's ass conversed with its rider?

Do you think that the promise of forgiveness and that the shedding of Christ's blood would atone for man's transgressions, by so simple a process as "believing," tends to prevent crime?

Do you not think, that to educate children to usefulness and to instill in them the advantages of a life of honesty, virtue, love and humanity, as taught by all the great philosophere of all ages, so far as history reveals, has a greater influence for good on them than the teaching of the Bible alone, as a whole? The personal God idea is fast dying out, and yet the world is getting better and more humane. It is true that both England and the United States are at war under a strong Christian influence, but there is less cruelty than formerly; the women, especially the virgins, fare better than they did in Joshua's time, when he fought under the direction of God himself, if the Bible is true.

Glenville, Ohio. J. C. BELL.

The Reign of Mammon.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven (by doing something useful for somebody) and all things else shall be added." Is this true? Has it been tested in practice, in business, by any so-called business men? Is there any honesty and justice in so-called Christian nations, in church, state or business between Capital and Labor? If not, what will become of all these people after so-called death, which is life in happiness or suffering according to their deeds in the physical body before their departure to spirit life. All men are on a journey toward heaven or hell, "here or hereafter," if the Bible is true; if not true, it should again be revised, for the benefit of moral law-breakers. I quote from the Boston Herald, May 15, 1900, from an editorial on the Reign of Mammon, as follows:

"In the Senate, the college, and the church, as well as in the market, the shop and the parlor, it makes its baleful spirit evident. The worst of the matter is that there seems to be a steady increase of cringing submission to its assumptions and its demands, less independence of its behests, less confidence in the superiority of other motives and other satisfactions, less contentment with modest compensations of industry, less cheerfulness in conscious rectitude in our humble lot, in sobriety, in frugality, in sacrifice, in domestic simplicity, in social helpfulness."

Brother Jesus is reported to have given no attention to material things, and said his kingdom was not of earth. God, the Father, was spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth.

"Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect."

"Ye cannot serve two masters."

"Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

"A house divided against itself cannot stand."

In contradiction of the life of the humble Nazarene, his so-called representatives indulge in great wealth and luxuries in the midst of the suffering, starving poor. It has been said that the material wealth held by the church—the pope, cardinals, bishops, priests and preachers, would be sufficient to provide every poor man with a productive home.

Also, the excessive salaries and stealings in Governments would pay for a new silk dress for every woman, and free suffrage, that would secure free education for all her children, and "Peace on earth and good will to men."

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-SIX.

I have now written twenty-five letters for publication. With this I commence the twenty-sixth. At first I could not be sure my letters would be published to the world, consequently I made no especial preparation but addressed them to my son Carlyle, who has from the first been more that glad to hear from me.

Dear Friends,—for hereafter I shall address the public—Do not allow any thought to become crystallized or fossilized. The moment one does so, all progress is at an end. No matter what mistakes one may have made in thought, do not hesitate to change that thought for one which is higher and better. If a new truth dawns on the mind, do not fail to accept it, also publish it to the world and your friends; for this is progress—progress in thought. Finding Editor Francis kind enough to publish my letters—for I much desired they should be—I have, since writing my last, taken great pains to prepare myself to be heard by the world at large. I wish to lose my own personality, allow it to drop out of sight entirely, that truth may appear instead of Franz Petersilea.

Through many witnesses truth may be established; consequently I have visited and drawn together a large band of progressed angels or messengers, all desiring to give what truth they may be able to through this particular channel. I must, necessarily, still be the door-keeper, or, as you of earth are wont to call it, the control. Still, this is not precisely the proper word to use, especially in thought-photography. Guide or guardian suits me better, for I shall allow very many of the great and good ones who have become interested, to give their thoughts as occasion requires; but, before proceeding, I would like to say that my son Carlyle desires no credit for anything that we may give and, of course, he would also like to escape any censure. Credit or blame in this matter really does not belong to him; but, we here most sincerely thank him for allowing us the privilege of giving, through his assistance, the truths that we so much desire to give to the world. Now, as I introduce one after another of the great and good angels, or messengers, to those who read these letters, do not be astonished or incredulous, for I will not deceive you or introduce deceiving, false, or lying spirits.

When I was in the earthly life I held myself in the dignity of what I conceived, at the time, to be true. I associated with none but the good and true or, at least, I called no man friend that did not prove himself to be so; and, most assuredly, after twenty years of celestial life I have not fallen below what I was on earth. I have but one desire—Truth—and with it to benefit humanity and all with whom I may be brought in contact. And, now, allow me, my dear earthly friends, to introduce to you the soul or spirit of Charles Darwin.

"My friends, I think I am not a stranger or unknown to the most who will read the lines which I shall cause this hand to write. No doubt you all know that I was a naturalist while with you in the material or natural body. While in that body I studied very closely to gather all information possible concerning the material or earthly world. I was very eager to know how all things came to be and how they existed. I wanted to know all about the flora and fauna—all about insects, birds and animals, and, last but not least, all about man. I thought if I commenced with the very lowest forms of life and followed the chain up link by link truth could not fail to appear. My whole earthly life was spent in this arduous undertaking, and I sincerely believed that I had discovered truth and nothing but truth, in all her majestic beauty, and I passed into the celestial life firmly convinced that I was right.

"My friends, I had found one of the jewels belonging to truth; that was all. The Goddess herself was still veiled and coy. I had grasped the jewel, but truth had escaped me. Yet, I caught sight of her beautiful face still beckoning me on; but before I could overtake her I must retrace my weary steps and commence once more where I commenced at first. I had forgotten something, and must go back and find it. What had I forgotten?

"I had forgotten the spirit, the soul, the animating principle, the real cause of all that is, or was, or ever shall be. I had been delving in matter to the exclusion of soul. The real cause of life had escaped me and I was holding dross in my hand. I was dealing with that which covered and concealed life, to the exclusion of life itself. Now, I desire to retrieve my mistakes and thereby set things right.

"I was right in so far as the evolution of the material is concerned; but, I had entirely overlooked involution. I thought that if man had a soul—which I very much doubted—that continued to exist after the body was dissolved, that he had attained it through the process of evolution, and, right here, my friends, I shall ask you: How can anything be evolved that did not previously exist? Here is where I made my grand mistake. I was trying to evolve mind from matter: That is—I was trying to mold matter, gradually, up into mind, thence into spirit, and thence into the immortal soul, providing there were one. But of this I never felt assured. In commencing with matter I ended with matter, although not fully admitting this to the world.

"Now, when a man makes a mistake—as all men are liable to—he degrades his manhood if he does not admit it—if he does not make amends and try to retrieve his error.

"When with you, in the form, I did not know that I was mistaken—thought myself right—therefore could not do what I now so much desire to do—retrieve my errors and mistakes before the world.

"Through my instrumentality and teaching a great portion of mankind are swayed and now, finding that they are swaying in the wrong direction, it grieves me much, as it will all honorable-minded men and women when they come here.

"How it grieves the beautiful-souled Nazarene, when he looks back to earth and finds, that in his name, the most dreadful dogmas are taught. Oh, how his gentle soul has been wrung with the most agonizing grief. He desired to teach the world all that was good, loving, gentle, true. How could he, then, dream that men would misunderstand his teaching and meaning as they have? It was really some of these misconstructions that drove me away from so-called Christianity, that sent me searching out evolution. I could not believe in the old Bible myths, such as a personal God creating the earth, and all upon it, in six days out of nothing or chaos. I could not believe that he created a man, called Adam, out of the dust of the ground, then breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. I could not believe that he took a rib from Adam and made from it Eve. I could not believe in the talking serpent, the fall of man, and the atoning blood of an only begotten son of such a foolish God. Oh, no; I could not believe any of these stories, but knew they must be false, fables, myths, and I went searching after what I hoped to be truth, and, as before mentioned, found one of her jewels—evolution—but did not discern its twin jewel—involution.

"Now, allow me to make amends, I beg. If you knew how much happier I should be, how much more good I could do the earthly world, you would all listen to my voice and allow me to retrieve my errors.

"I had not been long in the celestial life before I was eager to know, beyond doubt, if my theory of evolution—which by the way was not entirely mine, for others had also followed the same chain of thought, had been engaged in the same researches—was true; and, to my grief and amazement, I found that it was but half true—that my materially blinded eyes had entirely overlooked the most important part. Now, allow me, in a few words, to tell you what I did discover: Matter, Spirit, and Soul-germs. My speck of protoplasm, or matter, could not of itself take on any form whatever except simply that of rotundity—no, not even that, not even the lowest possible form, without the soul-germ, and soul-germs were distinct entities and never evolved one into another, or one from another—no, not even the smallest or most minute; that eternity was filled with these soul-germs as it was also filled with matter and spirit. In fact, eternity consisted of three primary principles, matter, spirit, soul. At first they were all minute points or atoms: A minute point of pure flame, or spirit; a minute point of matter, or clothing; a minute point of soul, or germ; but the soul-germ was that which fashioned and made use of, or covered itself with spirit and matter; that all soul-germs, or germs of life, no matter how low in the scale they might be, were distinct entities and could not develop into aught but their own distinct individualities.

"It now seems very strange to me that I could have overlooked such a great eternal truth.

"But you ask me: How, then, is evolution partly true, or a half truth?

"Because one form of life makes the conditions for a higher form to appear, makes it possible for the next grade of soul-germs to take up the matter which the former threw down, after developing in full all that nature designed them to be. The good guide of the sensitive whom I am using, informs me that he has already written all about this. So I need not reiterate it. He has told you the truth.

"If evolution were true, as I thought and taught when with you in the form, why one man or race of men might gradually evolve into another. How absurd it all seems and childish my thought. Races do not evolve one from another or one into another. A white race can never be evolved from a black one—never under any circumstances. That they may mix slightly, up to a certain point, I admit; but, beyond that point, or limit, they cannot go.

"Look at the American Indian. He does not evolve, he dies. It will be the same with the black man and African negro. "Many think the Africans will evolute gradually into a white race. Never! They also, as a race, will die but not evolute. A horse and a donkey may be crossed but can go no farther. You have a hybrid or mule and that is the limit. The mule ceases to propagate or evolve.

"The Chinese nation has been on the earth thousands upon thousands of years—aye millions. That nation has never evoluted into anything but the Chinese. When China is conquered by other nations, as it will be sooner or later, the Chinese will also die; but they will refuse to evolute. They will never become a white nation. Chinese they were and are and ever will be. That nations mix slightly, is admitted; but this does not continue. They die out as nations.

"One may cross roses and flowers but the tendency is ever to return to that from which they sprung. I admit that climate and conditions favor certain species to the exclusion of others, but the germs are forever true to themselves and naturally gravitate, or are attracted to the country or climate, favorable to their growth.

"I can never, under any circumstances, be other than Charles Darwin throughout eternity, and I am simply a developed soul-germ—the soul-germ of Charles Darwin developed up to my present condition. I shall never evolute into any but Charles Darwin; no more will the slightest thing that lives, moves, or has being and life.

"The Egyptian nation gradually disappeared—that is the greater part of them—but they did not evolute into any other nation.

"Dogs have been dogs from remote antiquity, and they have never evolved into any other than dogs; and horses will never evolute into any other than horses. But you ask me: Did man evolute from the ape or gorilla? and I reply: The ape and gorilla made it possible for the soul-germs of mankind to at length be inhaled and developed as men upon earth; but, all nations did not have the same root, and the soul-germ of no man ever came from a monkey, ape or baboon. The highest possible ape or baboon was able to inhale and make use of a germ a shade higher than itself. In this sense evolution is true and, as you see, is but half a truth. The whole truth is involution and evolution.

"My friends, the sensitive is new to me and I am not as well versed in thought photography as are some others. I have said about all I can at present but hope to be able to say much more at another time. Sincerely yours for Truth. CHARLES DARWIN."

Mr. Darwin found it difficult to control longer, being his first attempt to make use of the powers of any sensitive, and I wish to add a few words.

Mr. Darwin has told you that races of men, also different species of animals, do not run into each other, and I will here state the reason why they do not. All nations are graded and exist as nations—distinct nations in the germinal state—in the soul-germinal state—and when a nation has reached the development which nature designed for it, it disappears, or dies out; and so of all species of animal, insect and reptile life—so of all vegetable and floral life. When the earth has no further need of horses they will cease to exist or die out, and so of all other animals; and, as the ages roll on, man himself will also disappear from the earth; but, all these things, together with man, will be simply moved onward and upward into a higher state and condition.

Man while developing within the material needs all that is developed within the material, and when he reaches the spiritual or celestial, he needs all that the earth has developed which he considers beneath himself and could no more get along without it, in the spirit world, than he can in the material world.

My friends, let the solemn words of Darwin refrain again and again within your souls—repeat them to yourselves over and over again: Spirit nor Soul can ever be evolved from Matter. Spirit is Spirit forever. Soul is Soul forever. Matter is Matter forever. A thing cannot be evolved from that which does not possess it.

When Spiritualists accept the idea that spirit and soul can be evolved from matter, they are accepting that which is far more ridiculous than the Christian's idea that something can be created from nothing. But, there is a great verity at the bottom of the Christian's idea that God created the earth from chaos, and I hope to talk on this subject at another time.

If the ancient languages could be perfectly interpreted and understood, the Christian and the Spiritualist would not be very far apart: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was God," and the Word created the earth and all thereon contained.

Now, among the very ancient philosophers, the Word was synonymous with Spirit, and the three Gods, or the Godhead, meant Soul, Spirit, Matter—three principles combined in one. "And the Spirit of God moved on the face of the Deep." Now by this was really meant: And the Spirit and Soul descended into the Deep, and upon the face of the earth, and this created the living things within the sea and upon the earth.

How true and sublime! Come, Christians, let us shake hands and be friends. FRANZ PETERSILEA.

A DANGEROUS THING.

Hypnotism in the Hands of the Unscrupulous.

There are notable frauds outside of the physical phenomena; in fact, frauds in comparison with which those perpetrated under the name of materialization sink into insignificance.

For instance, when a medium presumes to become surrounded by a band of spirits under the various names of Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, Henry Ward Beecher, and many others of that class of grand and noble persons who have long since passed to the higher spheres, and under their supposed and pretended influence proceeds to hypnotize sensitives to do her bidding for gain regardless of the rights and aspirations of said sensitives and their families; proceeds to organize "all the higher forces" of spirit into one band, with herself as the high priestess, it can pretty generally be put down as a delusion and a snare, and when such hypnotism is carried to its extreme limitations and sensitives become temporarily unbalanced under its power, it becomes a crime the perpetrator of which should be severely dealt with.

Such things are becoming too frequent under the cloak of Spiritualism. There may be some method by which those farther advanced spirits can send their thoughts to earth, in fact there is but little doubt that they do, so long as their interests are with their earth friends; but as to their putting up, as a grand high "mogul" around whom to revolve, and from whom to evolve a "great reform," one so far below their own intellectual standing, and concoct some kind of selfish, narrow scheme in which they never were interested when on this side, there is evidently something very retrograding, in life after all.

There are cases in hypnotism where a wife or husband would be justifiable in invoking the law for the protection of the sanctity of home and the love that often so sacredly abides there.

A brain once over-tensioned requires careful nursing to again gain its equilibrium, and once clear gone a life is wrecked, and often those dependent upon that one must go down too, and some one who has held this accursed power is to blame, whether of the earth, of the spirit world, or both, and must sooner or later suffer the penalty of the wreck.

These are a few of the damaging things that rise up in the midst of our progress that threaten to overthrow the cause, or at least give it a back-set from which it requires time to recover.

There are many things in the philosophy of Spiritualism as generally accepted by the best reasoners in the ranks, one of which it will be well to state here, viz.:

"This power of controlling or overshadowing a mortal by a spirit, either in the form or out, is used in many ways, and those who foolishly or carelessly make themselves liable to it either by a careless, evil life, by seeking in a frivolous spirit of mere curiosity, or by becoming over-zealous to reach the hidden mysteries of nature, often find, to their great sorrow, that the low spirits who haunt the earth plane, even those from much lower spheres than they themselves belong to, can often obtain such power over them as to make them a non-entity, whose body is at their service. Many weak-willed persons who in pure surroundings would lead only a good and pure life, are drawn by evil surroundings into acts for which they are but partly responsible—acts for which indeed those controlling spirits who have thus made use of weak mortals, will be held responsible somewhere, sometime. For thus using another's organism, those evil spirits will have to render a terrible account, since they have been doubly guilty. In sinning and dragging down another soul, they sink themselves to a depth from which perhaps many centuries of suffering cannot free them."

This is the position taken by most writers along this line to-day, and is a very logical one.

I repeat, it has been only too common within the last few years for both males and females possessing, perhaps, some medial powers, to go about advocating some great reform or scheme that, as can be shown by and through them, is projected from the "higher spheres" in spirit life, and by the power of their eloquence and the susceptibility of their hearers, lead many into the delusion, who must awake some day to a realization of their own stupidity at not seeing the trap before getting their foot into its jaws.

Such designing hypnotists ought not to be shown any recognition in the ranks of Spiritualism. They are a detriment to the cause, and an injury to the sacred name of "medium." Let this shoe be worn upon the foot it fits, only. DR. T. WILKINS.

THE SOUL.

The soul is always wrestling with its chains
Within these dim domains—

Like a bird within a bounden cage,
It seeks its heritage.

It would be free, to sing and soar away
Into the dazzling day.

But when a great soul sweeps beyond the ken
And keep of mortal men,

Does it desert its loved ones here below?
I answer, Never—no!

It cometh back, celestial and refined
Of dross, unto its kind.

It walketh day by day, through gleam and gloom,
Unto the very tomb,

With all its friends and comrades here below
And this full well I know!

It counsels them, in many a subtle way,
From day to furthest day;

It helps them bear their trials and be strong,
And to withstand the wrong.

Thus do the spirits that have passed from time
To higher heights sublime,

Rule the whole universe, and ever higher
Will mortal man aspire,

Under their sweet dominion, till an hour
In time itself shall flower,

When crime and sin, and wrong forevermore
Shall vanish from earth's shore,

And the last sangreal shall be found! and soul
Forever sense control!

A FEW MORE REMARKS

Touching Upon Spiritualism and Its Needs.

"Nulla Vestigia Retrorsum" is Brother Francis' motto for modern Spiritualists, to which might be added "Sed Excelsior," meaning together, in a free translation: No going backward, but forward and upward—a very good motto for anybody, in my opinion.

I agree with Brother Francis, too, that "Our cause" is an educational one; the promulgation and general dissemination of knowledge concerning certain natural phenomena of human life, and incidentally such teachings in natural and moral philosophy as may be related thereto. If we should substitute the word Education for Spiritualism, and should call our cause modern Educationalism instead of Modern Spiritualism we might, perhaps, have less trouble in determining what it really is.

But we should not expect to accomplish very much as now organized. To do this, we must first make a radical change all along this line; in fact, there must be a complete overturning with us and a swapping of places; the present top made to take its proper place at the bottom, the local societies put at the top, so far as authority is concerned.

Our local societies are the source and basis of all there is in our organization and should always retain and exercise all executive authority. As now constituted, the N. S. A. is an anachronism in our ranks and a standing menace to our cause. Just now, it is not strong enough to exercise much arbitrary power, and its present officials may be and doubtless are, very worthy, but who shall come after them, and what designing ambition might attempt with this opportunity, "This must give us pause," and condemns it with me.

A simple, educational, reform movement, such as ours, has no need for a "Head" of this kind, but as a central, national committee, created by the local societies in convention assembled and entirely subordinate to their will, it might be a useful adjunct and valuable helper.

There is no room in the movement for anything but local societies, all others are hindrances and must go. We do not require one single boss in it; we do not need one single president, not one, but should make, and keep, our societies just as completely democratic in form and management as possible. There need be but one or, at most, two permanent officers in any society, and these to do necessary work, a secretary and treasurer; these should be chosen for certain stipulated terms and are, generally, the most useful working members of a society. A temporary chairman or presiding officer should be chosen at every meeting, and the whole society together should do all the balance of the necessary thinking, planning and work, the will of the majority controlling always.

If there is not interest enough in its work and success; if the membership of a society are not equal to its demands upon them, of course, it will fail of its high purpose to this extent. There is nothing compulsory in the movement, it is purely a voluntary one, and unless we have it in us to do the necessary work, it will not be done by us, that's all.

Our camp-meetings, altered to suit, and popularized, afford opportunity for necessary and pleasant gatherings and conventions. These could be arranged into district, state and national conventions as occasion demanded, and then and there we could meet, discuss and swap ideas and gather information ad libitum and at wholesale and have a good time also.

We should consider our local societies as schools affording the decarnate an opportunity to assist us in our teachings. We should remember the laws of affinity in this relation, that like attracts like; that a worthy capable instrument is more likely to occasion satisfactory results than one who is not. We should remember that grapes do not grow upon thistles, or figs upon thorns any more now than they ever did, and be careful in our selection of teachers.

Foremost among our teachings should be the central basic truth of the continuity of life, driving away all doubts, fear and dread on that subject, giving mankind to know everywhere that death is only a necessary change in life. This done and man assured that nothing can stand between him and the consequences of his own acts here or hereafter; that he, in a measure and to a certain extent, is master of his own destiny hereafter as here; that as he sows must he reap, here and hereafter; these facts made clear to the masses and mankind brought to realize that, individually, we are but parts of one universal whole, we may reasonably expect, as intelligence advances, such a revolution and change in private and public opinion and acts as shall greatly assist in hastening here on earth, that condition we have been taught to look forward to as "Heaven," meaning, as we all know, a place where common sense and even-handed justice prevail.

To know that we may assist in this good work, may accomplish it, ought to be sufficient incentive for a little personal sacrifice and effort. But "the thing won't go," sisters and brethren, without a little cash. This is the sphere of cash and a little of it is required in every business. Buy papers and books and read them and pass them around among your friends. The Progressive Thinker is a valuable aid and worker with us, an omnium gatherum, that should be read by every Spiritualist. Ofttimes one number is worth the price of a whole year's subscription. Bro. Francis is moved by the right "spirit" or right kind of "spirits" and if not infallible, this only proves that he is one of us.

But let us reorganize, or rather, organize properly. Then we need not be so particular about creeds and things of that sort. Where there is no authority but the common people, no opportunity nor incentive for its abuse, creeds are as harmless as spring water. Properly organized we have "the dead wood" on creeds, and that's why I am writing this.

The To-Morrow of Death.

...OR THE...

Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH
BY S. R. CROCKER.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he ever mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price $1.25. For sale at this office.

VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

∴ TO WHICH IS ADDED ∴

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens of the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

Well, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times. Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puttecn," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the spirits first," says his Riverence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymalchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Necthar itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his epistolical mouth with the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. THE SPECTER HAND.

Haunted Palaces of Queen Victoria.

Lest there should be any disposition to scoff at the specter hand which has created such dire alarm at Queen Victoria's palace of Hampton Court, and which has caused an artist of the name of Haynes to abandon some very lucrative work in the palace, which he had undertaken on behalf of the government, I would recall to mind the fact that ever since the reign of King Henry VIII., who compelled Cardinal Wolsey to surrender to him the regal abode which the too ambitious prelate had built for his own use, Hampton Court Palace has always had the reputation of being haunted. Although a beautiful place, and exquisitely situated in the suburbs of London, surrounded by the loveliest of grounds, none of the royal family, no matter how great their poverty, will consent to inhabit it, and even Princess Frederica of Hanover and of Great Britain, after her morganatic marriage with her dead father's private secretary had led her brother to stop her allowance, and to render her in that way absolutely dependent upon the bounty of her cousin, Queen Victoria, spent as little time as possible in the handsomely furnished suite of apartments placed at her disposal by the Queen in Hampton Court Palace, and preferred to lease small furnished villas and apartments elsewhere, mostly at Biarritz. In one word, she preferred to pinch herself, monetarily speaking, rather than to live in the haunted palace. There are many people who will be disposed to deride this as idle superstition. But artists of the reputation of Mr. Haynes do not relinquish profitable pieces of work, nor do titled ladies of limited means surrender so great and highly prized a privilege as free apartments in a royal palace for the sake of mere fancy and imagination.

Hampton Court—at any rate its residential portion—is used by the Queen to provide free lodging for ladies who have claims upon her bounty, such as the widows of distinguished statesmen, of old and valued court officials, of generals who have sacrificed their lives for their Queen, etc. Thus, after the death of Lord Granville, the friend and ministerial colleague of Gladstone, and so frequently Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Queen, learning that the bereaved Countess was in straitened circumstances, placed apartments in Hampton Court Palace at her disposal. Lady Granville never occupied them, and as soon as possible got them exchanged for apartments in Kensington Palace. Free apartments at Hampton Court Palace carry with them all kinds of privileges, such as repairs free of cost, exemption from taxes and parish rates, free lighting and heating, and in many cases free furniture. As I stated above, people of limited means do not give up such privileges as these for mere fancy or imagination.

Mr. Haynes, whose story has once more recalled public attention to the fact that Hampton Court Palace is haunted, has been engaged for some time past in sketching the old Flemish tapestry on the walls of the guard chamber. He did his work by broad daylight. He insists that almost daily a hand, white, delicate and richly jeweled, with a peculiarly shaped diamond marquise ring on the forefinger, was constantly appearing as if from between the folds of the tapestry, and invariably pointing downward. The hand was likewise seen by one of his friends, whom he took with him in order to assure himself that he was not the victim of some hallucination, and, after seeing the hand, they carefully examined the tapestry with the object of discovering some rent or hole through which it could have been thrust—but without avail. It is even said that Mr. Haynes took a snap-shot of the hand, and the camera does not lie, whatever the eye may do. In any case he has been so unnerved by the affair that he has relinquished the work.

Some ten years ago there was a regular exodus from the palace on account of the sound of the whirring from a spinning wheel at night. That the noise was a reality was certified to by police officials, and, finally, in consequence of their reports, the government office of works instituted an investigation, which resulted in the discovery of a bricked-up and until then unsued bricked-up and until then unsuspected chamber containing an ancient spinning wheel, showing marks of recent use. Reference to the old records of the palace show this room to have been occupied by Mistress Sibell Penn, the foster-mother of that young Prince Edward, son of King Henry VIII., who eventually succeeded to the throne as Edward VI. Mistress Penn was buried in Hampton Church, which was pulled down in 1829, when her tomb was irreverently disturbed and her remains scattered, and popular belief is that, owing to the disturbance of her last rest, she has returned to haunt the room which she had occupied during her life.

In the reign of King James II., that is to say 220 years ago, the City of London is on official record as having ordered 12,000 masses to be said for the repose of the soul of Queen Jane Seymour, one of the many wives of King Henry VIII., with the avowed object of "laying" her ghost, which in those days was wont, according to popular belief, to wander near the room where Queen Anne Boleyn caught her sitting on the King's knee. Unfortunately these masses, the payment for which still figures on the records of the City of London, do not seem to have been efficacious. For Queen Jane's specter continues, so we are assured, to haunt the palace to this day, and the hand which Mr. Haynes claims to have seen is believed to be that of her ghost, owing to the fact that on the forefinger of this royal lady, as pictured in her portraits, there is the same peculiar-shaped marquise ring as that described by Mr. Haynes.

Both the late Lady Eastlake and the Hon. Mrs. Cavendish Boyle, ladies occupying apartments in the palace by the grace of the Queen, have vouched for the appearance of a white apparition, believed to have been that of Queen Catherine Howard, another of King Hal's many wives. They saw the specter near the Queen's great staircase, and have graphically described the ghastly look of despair on her face, and blood-curdling sounds of her screams. It may be remembered that Queen Catherine Howard, when imprisoned pending her deportation to the Tower of London, escaped from her room and ran along the gallery in order to seek an interview with King Henry, who was performing his devotions in the chapel. Just as she reached the door the guards seized her and carried her back, while her husband, in spite of her piercing screams, which were heard all over the palace, continued his devotions unmoved.

There are few royal and imperial palaces that are not haunted by one or more banshees. Thus, Holyrood Palace at Edinburgh is supposed to be haunted by the ghost of the murdered Rizzio, the troubadour admirer of Mary Queen of Scots, and it is noteworthy that when any member of the Queen's family is forced to spend a night in the capital of Scotland an hotel is preferred to the royal palace. The specter of Herne the Hunter is believed by superstitious people to roam under the oaks of the Home Park, at Windsor, during certain times of the year, and while the ghost of King Charles I. has, according to the testimony of the wife of the present Bishop of Winchester, herself a daughter of Archbishop Tait of Canterbury, been seen promenading the cloisters of the deanery of St. George's Chapel, at Windsor, the supernatural appearance of Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Bess of Shakspearean days, in the Queen's library at Windsor, has been witnessed and placed on record by the Royal Librarian, by a subaltern of the Coldstreams doing duty as an officer of the guards, and last, but not least, by Empress Frederick herself, the most matter-of-fact, scientific, and least superstitious of all the daughters of Queen Victoria.

The appearance of the White Lady in the old palace of Berlin and in the Hofburg, or Imperial Palace at Vienna, on the eve of the demise of any important member of the reigning houses of Hapsburg, and of Hohenzollern, are matters not only of historical, but also of military record, these supernatural and fateful appearances to soldiers on duty in the palace figuring in the military reports, while the Royal Palace of Stockholm has been haunted to such an extent since the assassination within its precincts of King Gustavus III. that it has been twice entirely razed to the ground and reconstructed, with the object of dislodging the supposed ghosts.

All this may sound ridiculous and childish. But who among us would not experience an uncanny feeling if forced by circumstances to reside in houses which had been the scene of a suicide or of a murder?—Marquis De Fontenoy, in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

IS "THE INFINITE" THE LIVING GOD?

I send my thought into the infinite—
Beyond the stars, by evening lit;
Beyond the blue of earth, or azure skies;
And yet, behold, to my surprise,
I find myself alive to all that is,
And wonder where the ending lies.

It is my soul that doth surpass these all—
My human soul that thus doth call
Not for the vast—the voids of space and sense,
But for the end, if end be hence;
For I would know of final end of Time,
And of my thoughts—my life sublime.

The infinite? Yet I am more, for I,
All space do occupy; and I,
On wings of thought, pass on beyond all space;
I penetrate all walls of place;
And I conceive of more in me than I
Of thee, O Infinite, most high!

O Infinite! Thou art a spectral ghost,
Compared with me—with human host.
We all surpass thy flight or stretch of time,
And we, not thou, are the sublime!
For us; how small thy spaces vast, or light;
How small thy wisdom of our right!

Thou art an idol; not a God of man;
Nor canst thou for the human plan.
We stand alone, outside thy power to rule,
Outside thy domain, though the school
Of our conceits hath named thee, The Divine;
And poured for thee its sacred wine!

But what am I, who thus doth dare defy
In measured speech this one so high,
Unto the world that crawls, nor looks above
Its crawling place, nor dares to try to prove,
Its idol-God, or self, beyond the light
I left behind, O Infinite?

I am a Soul, transcending Thee, or Time;
A living Soul, Being Sublime;
For thoughts I do create, thus named I know;
(Can waters higher than fountains flow?)
Higher, vaster, broader am I than Thou,
O Infinite; Life crowns my brow!

And, Infinite, thou art my storehouse, where
My things I place; my earth, my air,
All living things myself below; and yet
I need thy space, O Infinite,
To self express—to give myself the room
Of self-expression—not for tomb!

Intelligence is mine, not thine, idol;
I shall possess when thou dost fall
From thy pedestaled height of transient fame,
And lose not only crown but name;
I am—I am! Being Immortal—Soul—
Need I say more? I own thee—all!

I greater am than is Infinity—
My right I claim: I am—to Be!
Death its hold on me hath lost; for I am.
These other things of storm, of calm,
Tost by the waves of time and measured space,
May thus be lost; but I have place.

The uncreate I self-create; that I
A place may have; and standing by
Are other souls of men; I see them now—
Immortal being crowns their brow,
And we are Gods; else no God is, of all;
And we divine; aye, we are Soul!

Unfathomed depth, transcendent height of Life,
We are all Nature, rich and rife
With being God; creating all that is
Of life in earth, or in the skies;
Creating the infinite of space; and,
Creating Time; and thus we stand,

And talk of God's infinitude, of Soul;
Talk of the ages gone, of all
That yet may be; talk of Infinity,
Of Time, and of eternity,
Knowing that we will all be there to see
The changes wrought; untrammeled; Free!

Thou Infinite; thou art extended line—
Thou art no more! Canst thou divine
Our simplest thought, or tell a thing unknown?
Not one; not one; more than the stone!
But Soul creates beyond thy wisest ken;
It hath intelligence—thou?—When?

WHEN FATHER LAUGHS.

When father laughs it allus 'pears to me
As if the sun shone brighter in the sky—
Or jest as if a meller sort o' haze
Floats down in shimmerin', golden specks, and I Am warmed, an' filled with sunshine through and through—
Has ever sech a thing occurred to you?

When father laughs a feller feels as good
As he kin feel in this here mundane sp'ere
An' 'bout the same as if he'd went astray,
An' lost hisself, then found his pathway clear,
With sunlight floodin' the familiar view—
Has sech a notion ever come to you?

When father laughs it ain't no use ter frown—
I can't—not even ef the joke's on me,
For in the ringin' of that laugh o' his
So cheery, an' so honest, an' so free,
I feel his love for me so strong an' true—
Has sech a feelin' ever come to you?

When father laughs I often 'magine how
The Heavenly Father smiles to see his boys
A-playin' of their little earthly games,
An' findin' childish pleasure in their toys.
The very thought makes blue skies seem more blue—
Did ever sech a thought occur to you?

When father laughs it's more 'an that I hear—
It's jest an echo, like, from One above—
A sort o' shadow of the heavenly joy
An' tenderness an' sympathy an' love!
If you ain't heard ner felt it as I do,
I'm sorrier 'an I kin tell fer you!

A PSYCHIC HOSPITAL.

Kindly permit me the privilege of suggesting in "Light" the establishment of a psychic hospital. I have no desire to find fault, but what a vast number of invalids have spent well-nigh all their means (like the poor woman mentioned in the Gospels) upon physicians, and are to-day in more feeble health than at the beginning of their medical treatment! It is often said that Spiritualists are not practical. The establishment of a psychic hospital, and the grand results attending it, would prove that Spiritualists are decidedly practical.

Let the institution be unsectarian—separate, on the one hand, from the ordinary medical school, and on the other from the anti-vivisection movement; the assurance being, however, given that within its walls there shall be no hacking up of either animals or human beings. Let the institute be simply a place for the healing of disease. I have strong reasons for believing that a hospital such as described would be liberally supported. Those interested in the teachings of Christ have now an opportunity of helping on, directly or indirectly, the work in view.

MATERIALIZATION OF ANIMALS.

The interesting account given in "Light" by Mr. Gambier Bolton, of "Materializations of Animals" which he witnessed and identified at seances with Mr. Craddock, would, I think, be better understood if the fact were accepted that, to say the least, no form of life exists in its physical aspect which does not possess a soul; or, to put the matter more correctly, no existing life is other than the physical manifestation of souls in various stages of growth or progress. In their various communications, discarnate human souls have occasionally spoken of seeing animals which they recognized as old earth friends; but it was also remarked that they very soon disappeared. Whither did they go? I believe, to their next stage of growth—to their next incarnation. But, in the meantime, whilst in the discarnate state they would be very likely to gravitate towards earth friends who had helped or loved them; and should the opportunity occur to them of the presence of a materializing medium, they would, at the right moment, spontaneously and automatically build up their former physical appearance from the medium's vibrations.

Did mankind recognize and accept these facts, I venture to think that such recognition would materially modify the present ideas of responsibility and duty towards their humbler fellow creatures; and they would not dare to degrade their own nature and their own soul's growth by killing them either for sport or for food. The question of necessity need not be discussed. There is no necessity. It is quite the other way about.

We live in an atmosphere of blood and slaughter. Were, say, Great Britain to recognize the folly and wickedness of it, with all the terrible degradation it involves, and forthwith put an end to it, disease and death by disease, now almost a rule without exception, would rapidly become a misery of the past, to say nothing of the necessary decrease of crime. Is it never considered that we have no right to suffer from disease, much less to die from it, or more correctly speaking, from its suppressive treatment which is so universal and so anomalously called scientific?

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

MEDIUMISTIC CONTROL.

"Light" continues to print the unpublished "Spirit Teachings" of the late Wm. Stainton Moses, M. A., and as a footnote is the following interesting description of the modus operandi of the communicating intelligences:

During the whole time in which the above communication was written my spirit was separated from the body. I could see from a short distance the hand as it wrote. It is important to record exactly what occurred. The place is my own room. It is now 2:30. I felt an impression to write, such as I have not felt for nearly two months. I sat down at my desk, and the first part of the communication was written. I presume I then passed into the state of unconscious trance. The next thing I remember was standing in spirit near my body, which was seated, holding the pen, before the table on which this book was placed. I looked at it and at the arrangements of the room with great interest. I saw that my body was there, and that I was joined to it by a thin line of light. Everything material in the room looked shadowy, and everything spiritual seemed solid and real. Behind my body, with his own hand held over the head, and the other over the right hand which held the pen, stood Rector. In the room, besides, were Imperator and several of the spirits who have influenced me for so long. Others whom I did not know, passed in and out, and appeared to regard the experiment with interest. From the ceiling, or rather through the ceiling, streamed down a mild, pleasing light, and now and again rays of bluish light were shot down on my body. When this was done I saw the body jerk and quiver. It was being charged, as I may say. I noticed, moreover, that the daylight had faded; the window seemed dark, and the light by which I saw was spirit light. I could hear perfectly well the voices of the spirits who spoke to me. They sounded very much as human voices do, but were more delicately modulated, and sounded as though from a distance. Imperator explained to me that I was seeing an actual scene which was intended to show me how the spirits operated. Rector was writing, and it was not done, as I had imagined, by guiding my hand or by impressing my mind, but was done by directing onto the pen a ray which looked like blue light. The force so directed caused the pen to move in obedience to the will of the directing spirit. In order to show me that the hand was a mere instrument, not essential to the experiment, the pen was removed from the hand, and kept in position by the ray of light which was directed upon it. To my great surprise, it moved over the paper and wrote as before. I cried out with astonishment, and was warned to keep still, lest I should break the conditions. A great part of what is written above was really done without the intervention of a human hand; and the rest without the aid of my spirit or myself.

Imperator explained that the sounds could be made in the same way without aid from anything material. I heard the sounds of the fairy bells all the time, and the air was pervaded by a subtle perfume which is quite perceptible to my senses now. I did not observe how the sound was made, but I saw, in a distant part of the room near the ceiling, something like a box, round which this blue electric light played, and I associated the sound with that. The spirits were dressed as I have seen them before, and moved about, quite independent of the material obstacles round them. Several remarks were addressed to me, but I was not encouraged to talk. I remember seeing Grocyn, C. S., Mentor, Doctor, R., Philosophus, Prudens, and others. They, or some of them, formed a circle round the table at which my body sat. I seemed to myself to be garbed in white, with a blue cincture. There was some purple, too—I think a sort of over-robe. Every spirit was self-luminous, apparently; and the room was very light.

I was told that it was not easy to write without human aid, and that the spelling of the words was wrong. I find that such is the case in the parts that were written as I described above.

I remember mentally wondering how such spirits spoke English, and in reply to my thought several addressed me one after another in different languages. They were not intelligible to me, but were interpreted by Imperator. He also showed me how spirits commune with each other as though by transfusion of thought.

After all this had passed I was commanded to return and write down what I saw. I do not remember the return to my body, and presume that my spirit was thrown into a state of unconscious trance.

I feel a slight headache. I am perfectly certain as to what occurred, and reported it simply and without exaggeration. I may have omitted facts. I have added or altered none.

Prof. Lockwood in Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Woman's Progressive Union of Brooklyn, N. Y., brought its season to a close on Sunday evening, June 3, with a grand lecture by Professor Lockwood, assisted by Mr. Fred Watson as pianist; Mr. Mausergh also giving a recitation in a most acceptable manner.

The subject upon which Mr. Lockwood based his remarks was "The Moral Value of Psychology and Hypnotism in Medicine and Social Ethics."

The hall was well filled by an enthusiastic and appreciative audience. Some of the members presented the Professor with a large basket of American Beauty roses, as a small recognition of their appreciation of his work done for the society as well as the people at large, many being present from Manhattan, desirous of hearing more of Professor Lockwood's lectures; also of his plans for the future.

Our society feeling somewhat timid at first regarding the engagement of the Professor, now rejoices at his coming, and assures him not only a most hearty welcome, but many new converts and larger audiences when he comes to us again at the beginning of the fall season.

Professor Lockwood has opened a new and large avenue of thought, not alone to the liberal minded, but also to laymen and preachers, by placing all his remarks upon the basis of nature's correlations, and in proving them by his numerous and wonderful methods of demonstration.

His lecture on the X-Rays was one of high merit, bringing together many thinking and reasoning minds, among them many students of the medical faculty.

His discourses are given with dignity and intense earnestness, manifesting deep study and research, while the most difficult and sensitive points are touched upon with a delicacy of feeling, offending no one.

His lecture on divine and sacred love, so very often termed free love, and cast upon Spiritualism and its followers as a degradation, was handled with so much care, so much delicacy of feeling, inspiring every one present with the sacredness of its meaning, that a storm of applause followed the Professor long after he had taken his seat.

Every one of his lectures delivered was a gem in itself, and we predict a great future for Professor Lockwood in this, our City of Churches. Our people have at last awakened out of their sleep; although still rubbing their eyes, their ears are catching the expressions of one who stands as a master upon the rostrum of Spiritualism, willing to demonstrate and explain its grand and glorious truths.

PAST AND PRESENT.

Outlook for Spiritualism in California.

Some fifteen or twenty years ago, while on a visit to this city, I was particularly struck with the great interest and enthusiasm everywhere manifested in Spiritualism. Eloquent speakers, wonderful mediums, convincing proofs of spirit presence and power, were everywhere in evidence.

Among the phenomenal lecturers then present here was W. J. Colville. I called his attention to my observation, and asked him how he accounted for it. He replied enthusiastically: "I believe the close proximity of this coast to India, and the great nations of the far East, the trade winds, and the climatic conditions always prevailing on this coast, will render this, the central portion of it, more eligible and attractive, to not only invalids, but to those seeking homes in an equable temperature, insuring a dense population here, thus preparing and rendering eligible this coast as the most favorable portion of the earth's surface for the manifestation and development of spirit power and spirit influences."

And at that time there certainly was sufficient evidence to induce the belief that California was the favored location, judging from the great rush of eloquent speakers, wonderful mediums, and the interesting phenomena, that so often appeared in the numerous circles assembled in all parts of the city.

But gradually the enthusiasm died away, the meetings were less in number and the attendance far less, in those kept open. Fraudulent mediumship crept in and destroyed the interest of the investigators and weakened the faith of believers.

Soon the lack of means for paying teachers was apparent, and they gradually disappeared, and with few honorable exceptions, both lecturers and reliable mediums withdrew from this once phenomenal field of spirit presence. Among the few that remain of the older prominent workers on this coast, I am glad to recognize our devoted sister, Mrs. Elizabeth L. Watson, whose world-wide fame endears her to every lover of pure morality and honest mediumship.

Ill health and a sensitive nature has so depleted her nervous system, through all these years of fraud, inharmony and consequent discouragement, that she has been unable to engage in much active work for several years, although always ready to respond cheerfully to every call of duty on this coast, beside having yielded in two or three instances to invitations to visit the East, and contribute of her remarkable inspirational ability at camp-meetings and other public gatherings for the benefit of the great cause in which she has for thirty-five years been engaged.

Having partially recovered from her prostration last fall, upon the earnest solicitation of the president (who is also president of the State Society) and board of directors of the local society of San Jose, they being personal friends and living within ten or twelve miles of her own home, she consented, for a very small salary, to serve that society for six months as their pastor, being assured she was the choice of the society, and that they had sufficient means on hand to pay their indebtedness and all their current expenses for the next six months.

Under those favorable circumstances she felt justified in attempting to resume her former labors in the cause for which she had labored so long and suffered so much.

But before the expiration of half the time for which she had been engaged, the board had a disagreement, the president and a part of the board resigned, and asked her to cancel her engagement, as there was no money in the treasury to pay her salary, etc., which she felt obliged to do, as the inharmony and the bickering among the officers had quite broken up the society, and the effect upon the pastor had quite prostrated her, from which she has not yet recovered.

I refer to this, just at this time and place, to illustrate similar cases that are occurring all over America to-day, principally from the fact that many of our local societies are in the hands and under the management of inefficient, incompetent men. The exception only proves the rule. Is it not time, then, that we appeal to the working women in our ranks to come to the front and save our local societies from the oblivion to which they seem doomed. I know of but one local society in California that is an exception to this rule. There may be some in the small towns not on the record.

The one to which I refer is the Harmonial Spiritual Society of Los Angeles. While the president of that society is not a woman, I believe all who know the secretary, Mrs. Nettie Howell, and the position she holds in that society, will admit that to her persevering energy and devotion to the interests of the society, it owes its financial position and social standing.

If the local societies of San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose were under the management of the women of those organizations, there would be less inharmony, less complaint of the appropriation of the "Sleeper fund," less difficulty in raising the money to support their societies and provide for the sick and indigent mediums that are worn out in the faithful service of our cause.

Through climatic conditions, spirit influences, or some other cause, a majority of all prominent and popular spiritual teachers and mediums have visited this coast from time to time and contributed their mite toward sustaining what seems a sinking cause here at present. They have nominally one society each in San Francisco and Oakland. Mrs. R. S. Lillie administers to one on Sunday mornings and to the other on Sunday evenings. With her well-known ability, sincerity and perseverance, coupled with the assistance of her husband's fine musical talent, she fails to fill even a medium sized hall once each week, and this in a community of probably double what it was twenty years ago.

A very lamentable effort was made a few years ago to form a State Society, with the hope and expectation of resuscitating the cause and giving new life and activity to all parts of the State and removing as far as possible the large number of fraudulent mediums thought to be practicing deception here.

Through mismanagement, indifference and inharmony, the good that was expected to result to the great cause of Spiritualism in California has never been realized, and it is claimed by many of its original friends that more harm than good has resulted to the cause.

Out of the several Spiritual papers that have been published in this State in the last twenty years, the "Religio Philosophical Journal" is about the only one left to tell the tale, and mark the decline of what Brother Colville predicted to be the favorite resort of spirits desiring to communicate with mortals, and the Elysium Field of all Spiritualists that could reach this summer land. The result has not injured Brother Colville's reputation as a remarkable medium, but evidently it has not done much to advance his claims as a prophet.

But there is a reason for this falling off of interest in California. Perhaps the same reasons have produced a corresponding result in other States. Spiritualists here differ as to the causes of the present depression. Some insist that it arises from the practice of so much fraud by those who have more or less real mediumship. Others contend that inharmony and the lack of kindness and brotherly love towards each other, have destroyed the confidence of those seeking to know the better way. Others, again, claim the times are hard, and they have not the means to contribute to the support of any church or religious denomination. All of which undoubtedly have more or less truth in them.

But a more probable reason which others have long since discovered was depleting our ranks and attracting those that have tired of the church and old theological dogmas, and are invited to unite with some of the new organizations, such as Theosophy, Social Science, Christian Science, Mental Science, Psychic Science and some of the numerous isms that are urging their superior claims, and offering inducements to attract young people, and give older ones advantages Spiritualists have never thought necessary to consider.

But the time has come when even Spiritualists must recognize the necessity of rolling up their sleeves and going into the missionary field, and laboring for converts so many sects are striving to secure to themselves.

Selfishness is perhaps one of the principal embarrassments Spiritualists have to overcome. Each one seems to be engrossed in taking care of himself. Hence the difficulty of securing contributions to build churches and provide means to support and educate worthy young men and women as spiritual teachers and pastors, and to provide for the maintenance of sick and indigent mediums, etc. It is this failure to provide these necessary comforts found in so many sects and organizations, that we find it difficult to enlist many of those who are truly Spiritualists.

This experience and observation is not peculiar to California, but unfortunately seems to pervade every community of Spiritualists in America. While perhaps there have been greater changes in California in the last twenty years than in many other States, the remedies that are necessary to reinstate and put upon its feet the great cause of Spiritualism here, are equally applicable to all other parts of the country, and may be briefly stated, viz.: money, brotherly kindness, and devotion to the cause.

MYTHOLOGY.

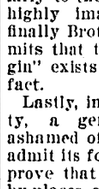
Innate Moral Sense Theory.

In The Progressive Thinker of April 14, Brother Chaney has a communication on "The innate moral sense theory." In this he takes exception to my using the term "unreasoning mythology." Says I would not have made this remark had I learned to interpret mythology correctly. He maintains that mythology is not only beautiful but is freighted with great wisdom. He cites the allegory of "Minerva springing from the brain of Jupiter, a full-grown virgin, in complete panoply." He admits that the girl wasn't a real girl. Says "Jupiter signifies good judgment; Minerva means wisdom, etc."; and that this is no imagination.

Perhaps Brother C. doesn't know how allegories are made. I will tell him. One generation starts them, in fashion childish, and of imagination crude. The next generation having evoluted another step up from barbarism, takes the imagined things and adds such further imagined beauty as its growth is equal to. And so on for generation after generation, till it imagines "a full-grown virgin, in complete panoply." It is born of the yet unenlightened imagination; as the traditions of our North American Indians are produced. It is a child of the unreasoning imagination similarly to the the imagined God of the highly imaginative Christian. And finally Brother C. comes round and admits that the beautiful "panoplied virgin" exists only in imagination, not in fact.

Lastly, in the slow march of humanity, a generation appears that is ashamed of its belief, but too proud to admit its foolishness, so writes books to prove that around in the corners and by-places of the imaginary thing there was "good judgment and wisdom." Brother C., it would seem, has yet to learn, that truth is that something that never changes.

Theosophy is another of those imaginary "virgins." Theosophy is responsible for most of the now outgrown childish allegories of the Bible, that Brother C. says exhibit such "good judgment and wisdom."



Brother C. also is wading up to his chin in the now outgrown astrology. Astronomers wouldn't give a nickel a bushel for all the astrological books the world has ever produced. I have had horoscopes by astrologers, and not one of their predictions ever came true. Sometimes they hit it, but not oftener than persons will, telling fortunes from tea grounds. I have myself predicted things I would see in tea grounds that seemed wild, and yet they came true to the letter. Had I been telling from astrology instead of the teacup, I suppose it would have filled me with a mountain of conceit, and that I should now be as rank an astrologer as is the most amiable Brother Chaney.

Brother Chaney says, "Astrology, Astronomy, and Freemasonry, are explained in Greek and Roman mythology, and in the Bible." If this is true, the wonder is that astronomers haven't discovered it, and thus get, by a few hours' reading of Greek and Roman mythology what now costs them years and years of severest study and labor.

I see no reason yet to change my expression, "unreasoning mythology."

SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1900.

Letter from Prof. Thudichum.

Washington D. C., June 1, 1900.

Bro. Francis:—After reading awhile ago an editorial notice in The Progressive Thinker of a series of pamphlets on church literature by Dr. F. Thudichum, Professor of Law in the University of Tubingen, I mailed him my article on "The Apostle Paul," and I think some other printed matter. I now have his acknowledgment of the same, written in German, and inclose you herewith a translation.

Tubingen, Wirtemborg,
26 April, 1900.

Honorable Sir:—Accept my best thanks for your kind communications. I agree with you in some of your views; That St. Paul is a legendary person; that the writings of Josephus have to be tested as to their genuineness; and that as to the Church History of Eusebius, many parts, in its present form, were added, and are not genuine.

But the opinion of Prof. Johnson that the letters of St. Paul, and the writings of the church fathers were not written until the 15th century must necessarily come to naught in view of the existence of numerous much older manuscripts quoting passages from these letters and writings by numberless authors, decisions of Councils and edicts of Popes.

I am sorry not to be able to read your articles published in the Truth Seeker [ten years ago, alluded to in the article sent] as a German Library will hardly have that paper. Our administration of libraries has so far paid too little attention to the literature of Freethinkers.

Repeating my thanks, I am, respectfully yours,

PROF. FREDERICK THUDICHUM.

I apprehend Prof. Johnson would find it an easy task to upset Prof. Thudichum's postulate in regard to the numberless manuscripts that antedate the earliest copies of the Pauline Epistles.

Anyhow, Prof. Thudichum's denial of the historical verity of those Epistles is important. As quoted by The Progressive Thinker in its issue of February 10, Prof. T. says:

"Paul had no historical existence, but was a priestly invention in aid of the general purpose to found a hierarchy."

That hierarchy Prof. T. thinks existed in the 4th or 5th century. Prof. J. holds it did not exist until the revival of learning, and he gives most excellent reasons for entertaining the opinion.

W. H. BURR.

As a Soldier Sees It.

The clergy have everywhere favored the war on the Filipinos, because they hoped with the subjugation of that people there would be new fields for missionary conquest. Let us view the prospect through the eyes of a soldier.

Lieut. E. O. Raynor, stationed at Caloocan, a few miles north of Manila, Philippine Islands, wrote a relative at Southampton, N. Y., as follows:

"We had a visit from one of those female women called missionaries. She informed me that they were here in force, and intended to linger until every germ of sin peculiar to this archipelago was no more. Bless her dear, deluded heart! It is not more religion these people want—they have far too much.

"When they become as sinful and irreligious as we Americans, then we may hope for better things of them. But on the religious question as it stands at present they can give us all cards and spades and then run out easily. We are in the midst of Lenten and Easter festivities. Tell your friends who are in the habit of celebrating Easter, Holy Thursday, Good Friday, etc., that they would not make a sideshow to the Filipino devotions. No, indeed, no more religion for these people—they have far too much.

"What we want to teach them is commerce as it is practiced in the United States—how to beat your fellow man in trade and do it first. No, the American, on a religious task, is too slow for these people. In all matters of business they will tell 'manana,' but when it comes to going to church they simply get there with both feet before daylight. I can count from where I am sitting the spires and domes of seven Catholic churches. Where can you equal that in our country, except, perhaps, in Brooklyn? And these are no small camp-meeting affairs, but grand structures, built of stone."

Down on 'Em.

"Place no faith in your churches. The clergy preach against raffling in saloons for chickens or turkeys for the poor, but a few days later advertise a lottery for a fancy quilt or an embroidered sofa pillow for the rich. Mark my words, there will be a reformation that will shake the religious world to its foundations." Thus Rev. Patton in a Toledo pulpit a few days ago.

Ushering in of a New Day.

The Bible has been a power in the world because in fact it was so little known. Though in millions of hands it has been really read by few, and still less understood. Favorite passages have been selected, and made the bases of learned disquisitions, while the main body of the work has been passed in silence, and only exposed by critics.

A privileged class thrust the Bible on the world as the inspired Word of God. They claimed the right of its interpretation, and subsisted on the emoluments growing out of that interpretation. They demanded one-seventh of all the year be given them in listening to their rendering of the book, and then they wanted one-tenth of the products of the fields, and flocks, and herds to supply their needs, claiming such disposition of the proceeds of labor was a gift to God, for which he would compensate the donor with heavenly blessings. This "gift," in some countries, assumed the form of a government tax the people were unable to refuse payment, while others were threatened with purgatorial fires until they came down with the last farthing. Thus a worthless class of non-producers have preyed on the toil of others while peddling their wares dishonorable to the real God, unworthy of man, and prejudicial to his best interests.

Education for ages, as we have often shown, was almost wholly limited to the priesthood. These self-appointed guardians of the public morals were very careful to only use that education in such manner as seemed to them best adapted to perpetuate their own selfish rule.

When the great common school system was inaugurated by that well-known Infidel and patron of Voltaire, Frederick the Great, in 1763, by which all public schools and institutions of learning in Prussia were placed under the supervision of the state, and provisions were made for their support, management, inspection, appointment of teachers, obligatory attendance of pupils; and parents were required to send their children to school, enforced by fines, reprimands and admonition; then the foundation was laid for knowledge among the people. That system, extended to other nations, the crowning glory of whose labors will be the destruction of ecclesiasticism, the downfall of the church, the discarding of so-called God-made books, the uplifting of humanity, and the enfranchisement of the oppressed, an event which is nearer consummation than is generally supposed.

The news of each week tells how the work is progressing, and makes all rejoice, save the few who wish to protract their power by exaggeration and falsehood. The following, clipped from a late issue of the Chicago Journal, tells how the work is progressing:

"Prof. Thwing, president of the Western Reserve University, has an article in the current number of The Century about 'Ignorance of the Bible among college students of both sexes," which is really remarkable. He asks whether the American people are really aware how the Bible has ceased to be a force in both their literature and their theology. He gives an account in detail of an instance where on two occasions he examined nearly 100 college students, and, to a series of very simple questions, received less than half the number of answers made correctly. The Bible societies, he says, may print the book by hundreds of thousands, but the people do not read it. Among the causes for this neglect of the Bible he gives: First, the fact that the world has become full of books, magazines, and newspapers; second, the decline of family life; third, family prayers less common; fourth, the Sunday school has not taken the place of the family as a teacher of the Bible; fifth, the elimination of the Bible from the public school; sixth, declining observance of the Sabbath."

Thanks to the higher intelligences and to expanding knowledge, for all these evidences that the priest with his book is hastening to his end. With the downfall of superstition will rise humanity; then farewell to Bible and creeds in its interest, made to enslave the people, culminating with the destruction of those creeds and the freedom of the world.

The Truth at Last.

Churchmen are not permitted to monopolize all the glory for literary "finds" in aid of their theology. The Hindus have just dug up a valuable work, said to be written in Sanscrit, the English title of which is "The Surging of the Ocean of Time." An English scholar has made a translation, from which we learn for the first how it chanced a woman was made, and how she gained a footing among men.

The narration commences with the information that the Hindu Vulcan, Twashtri, had exhausted all his material in making man, not an element remained. After profound meditation he took the roundness of the moon, the gliding motion of the serpent, the clinging of the vine, the velvet of the flower, the lightness of the leaf, the glance of the fawn, the gaiety of the sun's rays, the tears of the mist, the inconstancy of the wind, the timidity of the hare, the vanity of the peacock, the softness of the down on the breast of the swallow, the hardness of the diamond, the sweetness of honey, the cruelty of the tiger, the warmth of fire, the chill of ice, the chatter of the jay, and the cooing of the turtle dove. Blending all these in one he formed woman, and gave her to man.

Only eight days passed when the recipient of Twashtri's bounty put in an appearance, and said:

"My Lord: The creature you gave me poisons my existence. She chatters without rest. She takes all my time. She laments for nothing, and is always ill."

Eight days later the man visited the god again, and addressed him:

"My Lord: My life is very solitary since I returned this creature. She danced and sung before me. Glancing at me from the corner of her eye she played with me, and clung to me." Twashtri returned the woman to him. Three days after the man called again and said:

"My Lord: I do not understand exactly how, but I am sure the woman causes me more annoyance than pleasure."

Twashtri replied: "Go your way and do your best." To which the man: "I cannot live with her." Then Twashtri: "Neither can you live without her." Then the man, sorrowing: "Wo is me. I can neither live with nor without her."

This version of woman's creation may be relied on as authentic, for it has been "dug up" quite recently, and carries on its face the evidence of its genuineness.

"Never-Ending Life Assured by Science." By Daniel Kent Tenney. A strong and conclusive argument from the basis of science. For sale at this office. Price 6 cents.

An Inherited Faith.

Forty long and wearisome years passed, during which the writer lost all knowledge of a youthful lady friend and relative. Correspondence lately resumed, and conscious of the changes time has wrought in religious beliefs, we inquired of her present faith. She replied:

"I hold to the religious opinions of my venerated mother, and all my children, save the youngest, are, like myself, members of the Baptist church."

That mother, whose earthly form has mouldered to dust, was one of the best and worthiest of women; and her virtues, without a blemish, were transmitted to her children. To say we imitate our mothers in their nobility of character, their love of home, devotion to family, faithfulness to every trust, generosity to the poor, love of friends, self-abnegation, care for the sorrowing, sympathy for the grieving, and the practice of every virtue, is commendable in the extreme; but we cannot approbate the inheritance of the errors of even a mother's belief, which descended to her from a remote ancestry, false in the beginning, and will remain false so long as entertained, however numerous the generations to which it may be transmitted.

A seven by nine heaven just above the clouds, constructed by an ignorant and personally interested priesthood, in a barbarous age, when the earth was supposed to be a plane, the center of the universe, to which the sun and stars were secondary; and a God who made that universe correspondingly diminutive; a God who shamelessly seduced a betrothed peasant girl in Judea, and begot a son by her; whom he allowed to be sacrificed on a cross to compensate himself for the alienation of a world, may very properly give place to a heaven as boundless as are the suns and worlds rolling in space; and to a God capable of framing laws by which every atom of matter, organized or otherwise, may know and keep its place in the grand economy of a limitless universe.

The dead and buried Past has already ruled the world quite too long. Knowledge has everywhere advanced. The cerulean vault bending over Jerusalem, on the summit of which was the New Jerusalem with golden streets, lordly mansions, and abject angels, governed by a despot whose greatest pleasure seems to have been to listen to the adulation of his serfs, whose endless chorus was "glory, glory, glory," has vanished like the airy castles imagination builds in moments of frenzy. The religion, an outgrowth of that narrow conception of the material and celestial worlds, over which a repentant God presided, and the priests who minister at his altars, should join the bats in an old Gothic cathedral; while worshiper and worshiped should unite in a grand procession, and make a tour of observation to note the changes time has wrought since some person simulating a Moses stole Egyptian thought, and wove from the shoddy material a new faith, ostensibly the parent of Christianity, which was to become world-wide, and supersede all other religions.

A person is neither entitled to censure nor to credit for entertaining inherited opinions. They come to him as an estate, "for which he neither toiled nor thought," and which he will not discard until awakened reason comes to his aid. He may, like a Gladstone, spend a long life in active public duties, and never stop to think how shallow and false his faith. Another, by an intuitive thought, from whence no one knows, begins a train of reflections that end in very youth in emancipating his mind from all the horrors of a baby-taught creed. And those reflections, if well sustained by logic, are liable to accompany him through life; and we trust will bloom in fruition when mortality is laid aside, and the disenthralled spirit is permitted to revel in the bliss of perfected being.

They Will Try Again.

Durand is a town of Northern Illinois, in Winnebago county, a few miles northwest of Rockford. The revivalists dropped down upon that quiet village a few weeks ago, and beat up for recruits to people heaven. For four long and weary weeks they preached, prayed and sung. For four weeks, according to the Evangelists' statement, they had God in their midst and the people by the ears, and hell looming in the distance, while the mountain peaks of the New Jerusalem were just over the hill where God dwelt with his virgin-born son. They toiled, they exhorted, they agonized, and they wept. When stock was taken at the close of their protracted effort two measly recruits were added to the army of the Lord. But the heavenly moonshiners on leaving promised to return in two weeks and try again. We wish them better success next time.

Worthless Expenditures.

The American people spend every year upon liquor $1,500,000,000; for tobacco, $750,000,000; for theatres, $350,000,000; for feathers, $60,000,000; for chewing gum, $25,000,000, and for foreign missions the paltry sum of $5,000,000.—Ex.

Whether expended for stimulants, or for depressants, as in case of tobacco; for novels, of which theaters are a class; for unsanitary feathers; or for useless chewing gum; all of which our progressive readers very generally discard; the "paltry sum" wasted on foreign missions is probably as valueless as any of them. Their effect has been to incite discord among distant peoples where harmony formerly prevailed.

Two thousand six hundred and ninety millions of dollars annually expended in America for objects that scarcely in any way enhance human happiness! Want and destitution could be banished from this country by the proper distribution of such vast wealth.

All Are Spiritualists.

The Buffalo Evening Times has made the wonderful discovery that Alfred R. Wallace, who is classed with evolutionists; Sir William Crookes, chemist; Camille Flammarian, astronomer; William Denton, geologist; and Thomas Edison, inventor, are Spiritualists.

The editor of the Times, had he been in full possession of all the facts, would have found Spiritualists in every department of life. The bar, the bench, the pulpit, college and university professors, the floors of Congress and State Legislatures abound with Spiritualists. In private conversation with laymen in the churches scarcely one can be found who rejects the idea of spirit communion with the living. The poets, judging by their effusions, were and are all Spiritualists. Indeed, their poetical fire, as Milton expressed it, was—

"Lit by no skill of mine" [theirs].

Cured in Answer to Prayers.

After lying helplessly on her back for forty-seven years Mrs. Josephine Hasam, the authoress-poetess, residing at 1302 St. Mary street, New Orleans, without premonition or thought, lately attempted to walk and succeeded.

A year ago, says the Times-Democrat, on Ascension Thursday, a lamp was lighted in St. Alphonsus church and it was agreed by the congregation to say novenas for Mrs. Hasam's recovery. Yesterday Mrs. Hasam was, as usual on Sunday, lifted from her bed to a small vehicle and wheeled to St. Alphonsus church. After the services she returned and for the first time in years felt an impulse to walk. She found little trouble in getting about the room, and was made so happy by the discovery of her returned power that she became hysterical. After she recovered her composure she tried to walk again and again and then summoned her children and grand-children, who trooped in one by one, if anything more surprised than the invalid.

The news soon spread through the neighborhood and to the church, and throughout the day people poured in to congratulate the family. Mrs. Hasam and her children seemed convinced that the recovery was a direct response to the prayers said, and the devout ones of St. Alphonsus, without exception, expressed a conviction that it was due to supernatural interposition.

Mrs. Hasam is 67 years of age, but is wonderfully preserved and does not appear a day over 45. Her maiden name was Ormsby. In 1852 she was married to Thomas Hasam, a pioneer lumber dealer, who died in 1885. During her youth Mrs. Hasam contributed to the leading magazines of the day, and was considered an adept in the use of good English and a poetess with a future.

Her invalidism was caused by pelvic trouble at the age of 20. For years thereafter specialists throughout the country were consulted. They operated on Mrs. Hasam, but without avail. The last operation was performed by a local physician fifteen years ago, since which no medical practitioner has been called into the case. During that period the invalid had no medical attention of any kind. She was paralyzed in the region of the hips, and could not stand on her feet, even when held in that position by willing arms, without suffering excruciating pain.

"Yes, I can walk; I have walked about the rooms to-day, the first time in forty-seven years," said Mrs. Hasam joyfully to a reporter last night, "I hope it is a final and complete recovery, but I don't know. I may not be able to walk to-morrow.

"Of course, I firmly believe it is through a supernatural power this boon has been granted me. For a year my friends have been saying novenas for me. My recovery, I feel sure, is an answer to our prayers. I cannot believe otherwise. I hope it will be a lasting one."

The children of Mrs. Hasam are Thomas R. Hasam, a commission merchant in the City of Mexico; Sidney Hasam, a local manufacturer of boxes, and Joseph Hasam, who is employed in the City Hall. Sidney Hasam was seen at his residence 1445 St. Mary street, and said his mother's recovery was a great surprise to him and must be a greater one to the medical fraternity, which had given the case up as incurable. He said he could not account for the recovery except through miraculous interposition.

As we have said before Spiritualism is common to the whole world. Spiritualists have no monopoly on its wondrous revealments. The manifestations of the spirit come to all classes and sects of people. The above cure was performed, no doubt, by Catholic spirits, however bigoted and anti-progressive they may have been. From the time of Wesley down to the present period Spiritualistic manifestations have occurred more or less in all the churches. No one has a patent on them. The teachings of spirits are as diversified as those of mortals, and often contradictory; yet that fact is nothing against the grand truth that our spirit friends can return and talk to us, and establish their identity.

OUR PREMIUMS.

There are many Spiritualists who know a good thing when they see it. There are others, however, who do not seem to realize what is going on around them, and therefore miss many chances to enrich their minds and enlarge their understanding. Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World is furnished to our subscribers at less than cost, and should be in every family in the United States, whether Spiritualists or not. Volumes 1, 2 and 3 constitute a wonderful magazine of thought on Death in its multifarious phases; in fact you can not find in all the libraries of the world as valuable information in regard to Death as you will have presented to you in these three volumes. They are nicely printed, neatly and substantially bound, and are an ornament to any library. Volume 3 is furnished at 25 cents, much less than the actual cost to us, and the three volumes, when ordered in connection with a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker, only cost $1.10. The aggregate cost of the three books to the trade is $4.50. At this price, these three books ought to be in every Spiritualist family.

The Progressive Thinker is the first Spiritualist paper to inaugurate the Divine Plan—a portion of the profits of the office returning to subscribers in valuable books.

Myriads of Suns.

The New York Herald says there is a quite evident conspiracy on the part of the telescope and the camera to belittle this infinitesimal speck of cosmic dust on which we live, and they are succeeding. It was bad enough to knock the earth out of his position as the center of the universe, but now he is being relegated to a position that, astronomically, seems worthy of very little attention. Prof. Wadsworth, of the Allegheny Observatory, is now showing, on a curved plate, a photograph of the constellation Orion and adjacent region covering 1,000 square degrees, or a little patch measuring less than 33 degrees on a side, or about one-eleventh of the great circle—and what do you think? It shows 50,000 blazing suns. The professor says he has only been able to catch the light from the larger of the suns in that patch, and that these planets are yet beyond the joint power of the two cyclops, the telescope and the camera.

Something About Cranks.

The New York Tribune says that the crank is a man with a hobby run mad. In the pursuit of his favorite theme he has lost sight of perspective and the sense of proportion, and so becomes absurd. In common with all other callings, the ministry has its full share of cranks. The clerical crank is often pathetic, sometimes a nuisance, but always picturesque. Whether he is awry on some favorite doctrine or some moral or social question, he soon becomes a mournful example of good intentions gone to seed. The vagaries of clerical cranks would furnish a subject for an interesting book, if written by a man of sympathetic insight. A good clergyman developed into a crank on the subject of pork. He had become possessed with the idea that the use of pork as an article of food is the cause of nearly all the vice and crime in civilized life. His advocacy of this theory had become to him the only gospel worth preaching. He circulated tracts and circulars on the subject, which he had prepared for distribution. One of the tracts was entitled "The Relation of Pork to the Worm that Dieth Not." "The good cause is advancing," he said to me in cheery tones. "The people are coming to realize that pork is a greater curse than rum. I have organized a Society for the Suppression of Pork as a Diet. Here is one of our medals which I hope you will wear. On one side it has the motto 'Death in the Hog,' and on the other the initials of the society, 'S. S. P. D. We expect to form anti-pork societies in every church in the country. And three converted pork-eaters are about to make a lecture tour through the land in order to show to the people the horrors of hog-meat. The hand of the Lord is in this thing, and not even Chicago shall prevail against us."

The clerical crank who systematically wages war against the use of pork, exhibits his loftiest ideal of practical usefulness and gives expression to his highest convictions, and in so doing is honest with himself and his God. The Tribune's estimate of a crank is not founded on sound principles or common sense, and we feel somewhat inclined to express our high appreciation of the clergyman who battled for his convictions with reference to the proper diet. He probably remembered the numerous devils that on one historical occasion, it is said, took possession of some hogs, and he feels an inordinate repugnance in reference to them. The clergyman who talks serenely about God making man out of the dust of the earth, and Eve from one of his ribs, is a crank of the first grade in comparison with whom the Tribune's crank sinks into utter insignificance. Abraham, when with knife in hand he was ready to sacrifice his son Isaac; the Devil when he took Jesus to the top of an exceedingly high mountain and entered into certain negotiations with him; Noah when he got beastly drunk, and David when he danced before the Lord, might well be denominated cranks of superior order and exquisite finish.

It is too much the custom now-a-days, however, to designate certain ones as cranks, who happen in some important particular to disagree with you, or who try to circumvent your teachings or thwart your purposes. We are inclined to the opinion that any theory, however absurd it may be, is only a reaching out after the truth, and should be tolerated in its fullness; it will finally die of inanition, if it possess no merit. The theory that a "meteor was a living creature and possessed a soul," was only an inquiry in reference to that atmospheric phenomenon which has recieved the careful and critical attention of philosophers of all ages; and though absurd, the one who gave the theory expression could hardly be regarded as a crank, but as a searcher after truth.

A Good Thing,

The German Reformed churches of the Schuylkill Valley, Pennsylvania, have adopted the plan of tolling a bell while prayers are offered in their churches. This is a splendid idea. The tolling of a bell on this miniature earth, sets the atmosphere in vibration, which extends to its outer limits; thence, we will suppose, sweeps on through boundless seas of ether, passing perhaps millions of other solar systems, where God may be found on a tour of inspection, such as called him to the Garden of Eden, when Eve ate that apple, or when the builders of the Tower of Babel sought to scale heaven, and he came down to look after them and destroyed their works, "lest," as he told his partner Gods, "they become like unto us." Hearing the clatter of that bell, it is presumed he will turn an ear towards the earth, and listen to the prayers and praises which follow.

It is hoped the custom will not become general, else a perpetual din on earth may divert attention from other worlds, and perhaps end in a general smashup.

Chesterfield (Ind.) Camp.

The Program of the Chesterfield Camp has the following:

The different phases of physical phenomena will be presented by reliable mediums, through whom it is seldom there is not some proof of communication between the two spheres of existence. All mediums, both mental and physical, for the camp-meeting of 1900, will be selected and their presence solicited by the executive board. No others will be permitted to do business.

The Chesterfield Camp stands high as a resort for honest, truthful mediumship. Fakirs, tricksters and dishonest mediums will be effectually barred out. Other camps which admit fakes on their grounds would do well to follow the example set by Chesterfield.

Copy God's Example.

When God shuts up shop on Sunday, suspends all his labors, and sets his subjects an example of perfect rest on that day, then The Progressive Thinker will insist that all the world, and all the preachers in it, copy God's example.

If preaching is not "labor" then the passage so often quoted, "The laborer is worthy of his hire," is no way applicable to the preacher, who "toils not, neither does he spin," save on Sundays.

The Unlucky Thirteen.

As set forth by the New York World Hary E. Miles and W. F. Stafford, the motorcycle riders who were killed at Waltham, Mass., while pacing a twenty-mile race, had a premonition of their death. Upon his back Stafford, the rear rider, wore the fatal number 13.

Miles and Stafford were pacing W. C. Stinson in a four-cornered twenty-mile race. They got away slowly with Stinson and were trailing the line. In front of them were three other motor teams, each with a man following, and the speed was one minute and forty-five seconds to the mile.

Stinson's trainer gave Miles and Stafford instructions to go to the front. They started right in front of the stand, where fifteen thousand people had their eyes upon them.

When they started for the front the other teams quickened their pace. They gained somewhat on the bank and were just tied with the rear man when Champion, the Frenchman, fell at the front. His fall disconcerted the other teams and they ran up the bank.

Stafford and Miles, on the outside of the line, were carried highest, and Miles, who must have seen what was coming, tugged frantically at the handle-bars.

It would have been better had he never turned, for his course carried him directly toward an electric light post.

The motor struck with a crash heard by every one present. Miles pitched forward, striking the post with a terrible impact. Stafford flew through the air from the rear seat, and striking the post a glancing blow, went on through the picket fence and lay there, half way through the fence.

The race had gone but four laps of the one-third mile cement track when the accident occurred. Stafford, on the rear seat, bore upon his back the number given him for the motor tandem handicap scheduled to close the day—13.

Miles had but just announced his marriage for June 13, and his sweetheart had a seat in the grand stand. Miles came to her just before the start, and handing her $55, said: "You had better take this money dear, for I may be killed in this race and you will need it to get back to Lynn."

Poor Miles was frightened when he went out for the contest. He was white about the lips, and said to one of the other racing men who commented on this: "I am afraid. I believe that something is going to happen in this race."

Some of the listeners wanted him to withdraw. They said that a man whose nerve was shaken had no right to steer an infernal machine in a race.

Some of these very men picked Miles up and carried him to the dressing-room of Johnnie Nelson, where he died on the cot without regaining consciousness. His loved one flew across the top of the bank and followed the bearers into the room, where she fainted.

Stafford had also a premonition. At dinner just previous to the race he said to the landlady: "I do not know just who will pay you for this dinner. I may be killed this afternoon, and that would leave it for some one else to pay you."

Some days previous to the race Stafford called at the Charles River track, Boston, where he had been training. He threw a photograph on the desk of Mr. M. H. Dexter, the manager.

"There," said he, "is a photo of myself. You may want it soon to recall my appearance, for this motor game is very dangerous."

As long ago as last fall Stafford had a premonition of disaster. After a fall at Nashville he said: "I feel as though I had been through the battle of San Juan Hill. This will be the ending of me some day.

"That is all right," he went on, "but some day some one—and it might be me—will not be as lucky as I was to-night. All posts are not padded like that one."

His reference was to a post against which Joe Judge and himself fell as they came down at the corner. In that fall Stafford was on the rear seat and Judge at the front. Judge sailed away from his position, and when Stafford was picked up he was in the front seat, which Judge had abandoned, but could not tell how he reached the seat over the second pair of handle-bars. At Waltham the post against which he dashed out his brains was indeed not padded.

Probably the spirit friends of these two young men impressed them with their dire forebodings, and the unlucky 13 was only a strange coincidence.

From Gallows to Glory.

"As I have forgiven everybody for what they have done unto me, I hope they will also forgive me; for I am positive of the fact that the blood of Jesus has cleansed my heart from all sin, and I now know that I am a sinner saved by the grace of God."

The drop was sprung, and Frank J. Krause, at Allentown, Pa., on May 22, convicted of the murder of a girl and her employer, floated away at the end of a rope, to a world of eternal bliss, the protege of Jesus, whom he so ardently loved.

But where are the murderer's victims, in the light of the orthodox faith, they not being numbered with the redeemed?

INDIA'S APPEAL

That Ought to Touch a Heart of Stone.

Famine, from lack of rain, is now smiting sixty millions of our fellow-beings. At this moment, death by sheer hunger and thirst threatens one-sixth of that number. Thousands are starving each twenty-four hours. In that stricken land, the heavens are as iron and the earth as brass.

Birds of the air drop lifeless from the burning sky. Hundreds of thousands of cattle have already perished. In the absence of food and water, fiercest animals let go their hatreds, and helpless lie down together to die. The decaying bodies of men and beasts pollute both plains and rivers.

And the woe has not yet reached its worst. Face to face with even such horrors still stand countless little children, and women, and men, whom food will save. Thank God, relief may almost instantly pass, by cable, from this land of plenty to that India of starvation. Accordingly, only gifts of money are solicited.

What, then, shall WE do? What will YOU do? For our answer we are clearly responsible to both God and man. Ought not America to send quickly at least a million dollars? In the famine districts are efficient, devoted men and women, not only Americans, but also Europeans, who are already engaged in the actual rescue, but who are pleading for larger supplies. Surely such supplies can be provided, and yet the customary gifts to long-established agencies for the uplifting of the people of India not be at all lessened.

Meanwhile, the Government of India is organizing relief on a scale unapproached in the history of the world. Both treasure and life are given without stint in the saving work. On May 14, the number of starving aided officially was 5,795,000. That official daily aid will be steadfastly continued and increased, yet it will be unable to keep pace with the awful need. The death-rate is by far the greatest in the native provinces, where the Government has least influence and control. Only the united efforts of all the humane, the co-operating good-will of all the nations will suffice.

In this emergency, the Committee of One Hundred gladly puts itself at your service, the service of the cause.

Messrs Brown Brothers & Company, the well-known bankers, 59 Wall street, New York, have freely consented to receive and acknowledge all gifts sent to them. Every expressed wish of donors will be faithfully carried out, and the Committee, on its own part, will earnestly seek the best, most efficient, most economical agencies for the distribution of undesignated funds.

Together and at once let us move to the rescue. We can feed the starving. There is not a minute to be lost. From two to five cents a day will save a life.

A Charming Book.

Dear Mrs. Twing:—I am very much pleased with your charming and truly Spiritualistic book, "Lisbeth." It is an interesting tale and charmingly told, calculated to hold the attention of the reader from start to finish and to instruct him all along the way. I consider the dollar expended for my copy well invested.

Every Spiritualist should secure a copy of "Lizbeth," personally peruse it, and keep it for a loan to neighbors and others. I do not blame you for loving "Lisbeth," for she is invested with a lovable personality and one who reads of her becomes also her friend.

I can understand your sentiments toward her, for I have felt the same toward characters in my own writings. I believe that such have lived somewhere and have passed through personal experiences similar to those depicted by their writers.

I wish you the best of success with your book.

The copy you so generously presented to the N. S. A. Free Library is much sought after. It will do a great deal of good. Cordially yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY,

The Pantheism of Modern Science.

By F. E. Titus, Barrister,
Of Toronto, Canada.

To Prof. Huxley's dictum that there are three aspects of things, what meaning can be attached save that in every form of substance force is operating, and that wherever we find substance and force, there also consciousness is present—this consciousness even in the lowest form of matter, being indicated, as we have seen, by the selective capacity.

Let us add to this the declaration of Dr. Thos. Young, "that the unprejudiced study of physical philosophy provides us with analogies which lead us almost directly to the opinion that there are gradations of substance stretching all the way from the solid material to the spiritual, the more refined and immaterial pervading freely the grosser;" and the existence of gradations of consciousness, reaching from the inert mineral to the highest manifesting God, becomes a necessary conclusion; and with that there comes the corollary that in connection with each of these grades of consciousness there are accompanying grades of substance and force—the grade of each of the three aspects being in harmony with the other.

We are thus, step by step, led to the conclusion that intelligence is present throughout all nature. In the words of William Kingdon Clifford, in his essay on "Body and Mind," "The only thing we can come to, if we accept the doctrine of evolution at all, is, that * * * (for we cannot stop at organic matter, knowing as we do that it must have arisen by continuous physical processes out of inorganic matter, we are obliged to assume, in order to save continuity in our belief, that along with every motion of matter, whether organic or inorganic, there is some fact which corresponds to the mental fact in ourselves. The mental fact in ourselves is an exceedingly complex thing; so also our brain is an exceedingly complex thing. We may assume that the quasi-mental fact which corresponds and which goes along with the motion of every particle of matter is of such inconceivable simplicity, as compared with our own mental fact, with our consciousness, as the motion of a molecule of matter is of inconceivable simplicity when compared with the motion of our brain."

And, he proceeds to assure us: "This doctrine is not merely a speculation, but it is a result to which all the greatest minds that have studied this question in the right way have gradually been approximating for a long time."

Intelligence in Vegetable Compounds.

The molecules of vegetable matter posses, in a more marked degree than the mineral, the ability to select and combine with each other. Prof. F. R. Japp, F. R. S., who presided over the chemical section of the British Association meeting of 1898, is of the opinion that in the formation of even the lowest of the vegetable compounds there is most unmistakable evidence of the existence of intelligence. His address as president of his section was devoted to the purpose of demonstrating the reasonableness of that proposition and showing the former explanations of chance, coincidence and non-intelligent mechanism to be insufficient. He asserts the intelligence thus operating to be of precisely the same character as that which man himself uses. The following is an extract from his address: "No fortuitous concourse of atoms, even with all eternity for them to clash and combine in, could compass this feat of the formation of the first optically organic compound. Coincidence is excluded, and every purely mechanical explanation of the phenomenon must necessarily fail. I see no escape from the conclusion that at the moment when life first arose a directive force came into play—a force of precisely the same character as that which enables the intelligent operator, by the exercise of his will, to select one crystallized enantiomorph and reject its asymmetric opposite."

While the Professor draws the line at optically organic compounds of vegetable origin, and asserts that with them life first arose, his arguments lead to an altogether deeper conclusion. He combats the theory that living matter may be originated from dead matter by a purely mechanical process, and intimates that the attempted mechanical explanation of the origin of life leads to a reductio ad adsurdum. He confesses that if the conclusions are correct, which he believes to be correct, "then the absolute origin of the compounds of one-sided asymmetry to be found in the living world is a mystery as profound as the absolute origin of life itself." An asymmetric compound is one which is not complete and evenly balanced, and which, because of its incompleteness, seeks to ally itself with its chemical affinity and therefore continues in a condition of restless activity. He affirms that "The two phenomena" (life and these asymmetric compounds) "are intimately connected, for, as we have seen, these asymmetric compounds make their appearance with life, and are inseparable from it."

But if non-living inorganic matter, interacting with blind force through pure chance, the "fortuitous concourse of atoms," cannot produce the living compound, if "every purely mechanical explanation of the phenomenon of the production of the living compound must necessarily fail;" and if, on the other hand the phenomena of life and intelligence are inseparably connected with the phenomena of asymmetric compounds; and those compounds according to the principle of evolution, arise without the intervention of the human will and intelligence; and since the tendency of our scientific friends is to discard the idea of an arbitrary extrinsic controlling intelligence, why not calmly accept the only other legitimate alternative, namely, that it is incorrect to say that the matter of the inorganic world is non-living, or else that force, which is found operating in that realm of nature, has intelligent life as its inherent characteristic? May I venture to suggest that this would be more logical, more philosophical and even more in accordance with true science than to confess "mystery" before the necessity for so doing had inevitably arisen? No one is able to put his hand on the exact line where, in the descent from the organic to the inorganic, life ceases to operate, or even where the organic commences. "The principle of continuity leads us, whatever state of things we contemplate, to look for its antecedent in some previous state of things also in the universe," and in accordance therewith, the antecedent of that intelligent selective power which was exhibited in the first optically organic compound is naturally to be looked for in the previous state of things which we speak of as inorganic.

If I understand him aright, Prof. Crookes thinks he finds the evidence of the operation of the intelligent selective power in the precipitation of certain elements to which we have already referred. That intelligence which Prof. Japp associates with life, and sees exhibited in the chemistry of nature as it works in the living organism, Prof. Crookes discovers operating in the so-called inanimate, inorganic world. Does this not suggest that, instead of there being an absolute difference in the qualities of the two classes of matter, the difference is in the active manifestation of the quality, possibly coupled with a difference in the powers of observation and deduction of the two chemists? But even Prof. Japp's discoveries and conclusions travel a long way in the direction of the recognition of the universality of intelligence, for he finds it exhibited in tartaric acid, turpentine, the carbohydrates, quinine and other like forms of matter to which intellection is not usually ascribed.

If indeed, as Prof. Japp thinks is the case, there is no escape from the conclusion that inherent selective and directive force of the same character as the human being exhibits, be coeval with life; if as Prof. Crookes thinks, there is no escape from the conclusion that this selective operation is present in the very elements themselves; and if, with Prof. Huxley, we find that "Life was present potentially in matter when in the nebulous form, and was unfolded from it by the way of natural development," have we not covered the whole range of the primitive forms of matter recognized by scientists and found in them all the evidence of an inherent consciousness? Are we not justified in concluding that, from the very beginning of existence, inherent intelligence, of precisely the same character as that which enables the intelligent operator to produce desired results, has been at work?

Charles Kingsley, in Hypatia, expresses this idea of conscious activity in the lower kingdoms poetically and at the same time in accord with the most recent science. Says he: "Philosophers, when they gave mechanical explanations of natural phenomena, came no nearer to the real solution of them. The mysterious "why?" remained untouched. * * * * All their analyses could only darken with big words the plain fact that the water hated the oil with which it refused to mix, and the lime loved the acid which it received into itself, and like a lover grew warm with the rapture of affection. Why not? What right had we to deny sensation, emotion, to them, any more than to ourselves? Was not the same universal spirit stirring in them as in us? And was it not by virtue of that spirit that we thought, and felt, and loved? Then why not they as well as we?"

Where we had ignorantly (though as we thought with much of learning and wisdom) talked of inanimate, inorganic, matter, conscious life is present working intelligently and purposively, carrying out the universal scheme of evolution, which stretches from the lowest to the highest. Consciousness, dormant in the stone, is by the interplay of nature's forces gradually wakened into activity, and, as it wakens, it clothes itself in higher forms, each new capacity awakened requiring a higher organism through which to express itself and to expand; each ascending organism more complex and more refined than the last. Slowly yet surely it winds its way, climbs its path from lowest to highest of mineral forms until it stands on the border line of two worlds, the mineral and vegetable kingdoms, where it partakes of the nature of both to such an extent that we know not in which kingdom to classify it. From these intermediate forms it steps over into the kingdom above (the vegetable) where the plasticity of the matter affords freer play to the activities of conscious force.

The Soul-Life of Plants.

The consciousness exhibited here is of a most marked character. Let us take for instance the insect-eating plants. I quote from "The Story of the Plants," by Grant Allen. "Our pretty little English Sundew is one of these cruel and perfidious plants. Its leaves are round and thickly covered with small red hairs, which are rather bulbous at the end, and very sticky. The bulbous expansions, in point of fact, are small red glands, which exude a viscous digestive liquid. When a small fly alights on the leaf, attracted by the smell of the sticky fluid, he is caught and held by its gummy mass; the hairs then at once bend over and clutch him, pouring out fresh slime at the same time, which very shortly envelopes and digests him."

Let us take another illustration of these insect-eating plants from Mr. Grant Allen's interesting work. Sadly enough the most striking exhibitions of intelligence are to be found in connection with the invention of death-dealing mechanism. The height of plant civilization is apparently on nearly the same moral altitude as that of the human being. "One of the best known is the Venus' fly-trap of tropical or subtropical North America. In this curious plant the leaf is divided into two portions, one of which forms a jointed snare for catching insects. It is hinged at the middle; and when a fly lights upon it, the two edges bend over him, and the bristles on the margin interlock firmly. As long as the insect struggles they remain tightly closed; when he ceases to move, and is quite dead, they open once more, and set their trap afresh for another insect."

Herbert Spencer, in a phrase which has become famous, defined life as "adaptation to the environment," and common sense and intelligence are perhaps most strongly exhibited in making the best of one's surrounding circumstances. Measured by this standard the intelligence of the ivy-leaved toad-flax is of a high order. This plant grows on dry walls and has straight flower stalks, which become curved when the flowering is over. Why is this? Because it cannot sow its seeds on the bare stone the plant bends its flower-stalk after the blossoming season, and hunts about diligently for a crevice among the mortar into which it proceeds to insert its capsule, so that the seedlings may start fair in a fit and proper place for their due germination.

Notwithstanding the evidences of intelligence in the flower and stalk, the tip of the root, in its selection of just the proper location for itself in order to obtain the fullest benefit of the available water supply, and in the way in which it goes feeling its way under ground, touching here, recoiling there, insinuating little fingers among pebbles and crannies and trying its best by endless offshoots to fix the plant with perfect security, is the part of the plant which exercises the greatest discrimination and ingenuity. Darwin, because of this exhibition of intelligence, likened the tip of the root to the brain of animals.

Mr. Grant Allen, in describing the various elements which go to make up the life of plants, mentions how they eat and drink, how they digest and assimilate, how they marry and get fertilized, how they produce their fruit and set their seeds, and finally how they are often linked together into a single community. This summary bears a very striking resemblance to the range of activities exercised by the average man and woman.

In January, 1898, Mr. C. W. Dodge, Professor of Biology of the University of Rochester, N. Y., lectured before the Rochester Academy of Science on "The Psychic Activities of Plants;" that is the "soul activities of plants." A daily press report of his address says: "The speaker gave an exposition of the phenomenon of sight in plant life. Many views were thrown on the screen, of plants whose growth had been influenced by light. The sense of touch was also illustrated vividly, the peculiarities of their growth, under certain circumstances exhibited. The habits of certain plants of depositing their seeds in fertile places was one of the most remarkable proofs of a faculty which was too well known to be called chance. The existence of nervous sensations in plants was taken up, and the Professor showed that nerve stimulus was imparted from one to the other of many organisms in plant life, but more commonly in bacteria." The nature of his conclusions may be judged from the following extract: "Plants have souls and can see and feel in their own peculiar way quite as well, as far as their needs were concerned, as many creations of a higher order."

* * * * * * * * *

Thus, by new experiences through more susceptible organisms, consciousness ascends until it again finds itself enshrined in a form which unites two kingdoms, this time it is the vegetable and animal. Sensation—the power of translating the vibration received from external nature into feeling, which had began to waken in the vegetable, becomes fully developed here. A consciousness of comfort and discomfort, of pleasure and pain, marks its advent to the higher kingdom of nature. Here again scientific investigation has demonstrated the universality of the expression of life, and the striking similarity on all planes of nature of the phenomena exhibited through intelligence operating upon matter.

The Animal World.

In the inorganic world it has been noticed, as Sir Norman Lockyer points out (Studies in Spectrum Analysis p. 138), that "a compound particle—that is a particle known to consist of two distinct elements—has a vibration which is as peculiar to itself as the vibration of a particle of an element is peculiar to itself." That "a compound particle is a perfectly distinct physical thing, with vibrations, rotations, and free paths of its own. There is no apparent connection between the vibrations of a compound particle and those of any of the substances which make up that compound particle."

In the higher kingdoms we find that not only is the organic consciousness of an entirely different nature from that of either of the factors which produce it, but we discover that the lower organisms possess an independent conscious activity even while working within the more complex and being dominated by it. Says Virchow, "What is the organism? A community of little cells, a little state, well provided with all the appurtenances of upper and under officials, servants and masters great and small."

If we consider the human body closely we find there not only the human organism itself with its will controlling the movements of the whole body and each of its members, but in addition we are told by our biologists that "every molecule of matter in the human body is a distinct life," in other words, there are millions of separate lives all working under the dominion of the one human life. We are further informed by our biologists that of the microbes with which the human body is teeming, and whose presence our medical friends are making responsible for nearly all our diseases as well as our good health, each one in the human organism "has a life consciousness of its own, with a power of independent volition (within limits), with likes and dislikes exhibited in a strange imitation of the human being himself."

Mr. Alfred Binet has written a very interesting book called the "Psychic Life of Micro-organisms" in which he says: "Agreeable to the ideas of evolution now accepted, a higher animal is nothing more than a colony of protozoans." A "protozoan" is the first, lowest, simplest and most primitive animal. It is a complete entity which may exist within a single cell of the larger animal. "Every one of the cells composing such an animal has retained its primitive properties, giving them a higher degree of perfection by division of labor and by selection. The epithelial cells that secrete the nails and the hair are organisms, perfected with reference to the secretion of productive parts, similarly, the cells of the brain are organisms that have been perfected with reference to psychical attributes." And "Those protozoic forms of animalculae are endowed with memory and volition."

A Battle in Germ-Land.

The following article, which appeared in a recent issue of a daily paper, contains a graphic description of one of the incidents of life in the domain of the animalculae. It purports to describe what was seen by Dr. Donald Ross, of the Indian medical staff, who was investigating the microbe of malaria.

"During his investigations Dr. Ross saw one of the most remarkable battles that has ever occurred. This was a fight between a malaria microbe and three phagocytes. The phagocytes are really white blood corpuscles. They have been called the policemen of the blood, and their business in life is to devour all the impurities, foreign substances and disease germs of the blood.

"The malaria germ propagates its species by segmentation (that is by simply dividing itself into two parts). Periodically every day, or every three days, or every four days, according to the type of the disease, the full grown germ subdivides, and each division becomes a full fledged microbe with power to reproduce itself. The young germ, however, is in danger of being devoured by phagocytes in the blood. In fact a great many are thus devoured.

"It has instinct enough to protect itself from further depredations of phagocytes. It feeds on the contents of red blood corpuscles, and as it devours the contents it crawls inside the 'skin' of the latter, the better to keep clear of the phagocytes. These little scavengers of the blood actually have been seen under the microscope to be 'fooled' by this trick of the malaria germ. The germ does not eat the 'skin' of the red corpuscle. Therefore when the phagocyte comes up to the malaria germ inside the red blood corpuscle it may feel it all over but it generally passes by, misled as to its genuineness. So the malaria germ, secure in its retreat, goes on eating the inside of its little house and growing lustily against the time of its reproduction.

"While observing a malaria germ which had just acquired its flagellae (long hair-like appendages which serve the purpose of both arms and legs) Dr. Ross saw a phagocyte make its way to the malaria germ, probably with the intention of devouring it. Ordinarily this would have been easy, but the germ, instead of allowing itself to be attacked, attacked the phagocyte in a battle royal that lasted over fifteen minutes. Finally the phogocyte drew off and the germ, still full of fight, hurried across the microscope slide for a distance of two fields, to where another phagocyte was wandering aimlessly.

"It hurled itself on the second phagocyte, pushing hard against it with one of its arms. The phagocyte tried to rear up and get around and envelope the germ, but finally gave up and flattened itself against an air bubble, while the germ still kept on pummelling it. After fifty minutes, another phagocyte appeared coming rapidly across the field. The germ then left its fallen foe and attacked the new-comer. The third phagocyte got enough of it in about one minute, and turned squarely around, fleeing across the whole field, 'the germ hanging on like a snake on a dog.' After five minutes the germ let go and the phagocyte slunk away. The malaria germ had by this time reached the limit of its endurance in the rapidly weakening blood on the microscope slide. It grew slightly larger and quite sluggish and finally attached itself to the glass of the slide and died."

The Amoebae are microscopical organisms, a most simple elementary cell, a protoplasmic drop, formless and almost structureless. L. Cienkowsky (Betrage zur Kentness der Monaden Archiv. J Mikroshop, Anatomie) describes the way in which one of these microscopical, bare, reddish cells—the Vampyrella Spirogyra, hunts for and finds among a number of other aquatic plants one called Spirogyra, rejecting other food. Examining it under a powerful microscope, he found it, when moved by hunger, first projecting its pseudopodiae (false feet). It being so simple in its structure that it creates each organ from itself as the occasion arises, thus becoming foot or mouth or stomach at will.

Then it commences moving about until among a great variety of plants it comes across a Spirogyra, after which it proceeds towards the cellulated portion of one of the cells of the latter, and placing itself on it, bursts the tissue, sucks the contents of one cell and passes on to another, repeating the same process. This naturalist never saw it take any other food and it never touched any of the numerous plants placed by Cienkowsky in its way. Mentioning another Amoebae—the Colpadella Pugnax. He says that he found it exercising a choice of food, and he adds these significant words: "The way of acting of these monads during their search for and reception of food is so amazing that one is almost inclined to see in them consciously acting beings."

To this last observation we may add the words of Th. W. Engleman (Betrage zur Physiologie des Protoplasm). After reciting the efforts of the Arcella, another unicellular organism, to extricate themselves from uncomfortable positions, he says, "It is impossible not to admit that such facts as these point to the presence of some Psychic powers in the Protoplasm."

When we remember that the animalculae are so small that, as estimated by Ehrenburg, five hundred million of them exist in one drop of water one-twelfth of an inch in diameter, and that not only the blood, but the flesh and muscles also are composed of myriads of infinitesimal lives, each cell possessing a distinct life of its own, Binet's description of the higher animal as a colony of protozoans becomes remarkably appropriate. Each human being is veritably a Chinese Empire.

Thus we have traced conscious life from the dust out of which man is said to have been formed, up through all the intervening kingdoms of nature until we reach man himself, who possesses the intellect to plan and the will and capacity to put into operation those methods by which he controls all the kingdoms beneath him.

Conscious life present in the lowest kingdom of nature—the mineral. Conscious life everywhere in the universe varying in its degrees of expression between the fast-bound, slow and imperviable rock and the space-defying mind of man.

Thus the process of evolution goes on. Who will venture to say where it will stop? Having passed from animal to man, when man shall have reached the limit of possibilities which intellection affords, when the organism which we now use becomes insufficient for the manifestation of more fully awakened powers, must we not, judging from the analogy from the known path of evolution we have already trod, step into some higher form of expression where our powers will not be "cribbed, cabined and confined" as they would be within the slow moving particles of the human brain? Such must be the case if from the past we may judge the future. In his essays upon "Some Controverted Questions," Prof Huxley, keeping himself within the bounds of scientific thought, suggests this ever-ascending scale of intelligent beings. He says, "Looking at the matter from the most rigidly scientific point of view, the assumption that, amidst the myriads of worlds scattered through endless space, there can be no intelligence, as much greater than man's as his is greater than a black beetle's seems to me not merely baseless, but impertinent. Without stepping beyond the analogy of that which is known, it is easy to people the cosmos with entities, in ascending scale, until we reach something practically indistinguishable from omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience. If our intelligence can, in some matters, surely reproduce the past of thousands of years ago, and anticipate the future thousands of years hence, it is clearly within the limits of possibility that some greater intellect, even of the same order, may be able to mirror the whole of the past and the future." Ruskin (Ethics of the Dust) saw great good in this idea of the gradation of life, for he said, "it admits the idea of a life above us, in other creatures as much nobler than ours, as ours is nobler than that of the dust."

The one process of evolution links together the lowest and the highest, and in the inert atom of the mineral there lies the possibility of the man and the deity, which will waken into realization by the steady onward press of evolutionary process.

The recent discoveries of our patient scientific investigators are showing us that not only is there life in every form of matter, co-eternally linked to it, but that the difference between the consciousness of the atom and that of the cosmos, between the intelligence of the animalculae and the intelligence of the man, is but to be measured by evolution. It may be that millions of years may be required to waken the sleeping consciousness of the mineral to its first faint response in the vegetable, and other millions to raise it from the vegetable to the animal, and from the animal to the human, and then from the human to the cosmic—which we may not inappropriately term the Divine. But no matter how long the time, nor how infinite the variations of forms that may be required to accomplish the journey it will finally be accomplished. The latent potentialities which slept in the mineral will be wakened one by one into active powers and thus higher stages of consciousness will be reached. We can, to some extent, measure the possibility of future achievements by the depths of conscious intelligence which separate us from the mineral.

Our scientists are not insensible to the importance of the new and broader view of the universe which comes as a result of this closer study of the activities of living matter. Some, conscious of the radical difference between the conception of inorganic matter as being "dead," and the view in which it is now coming to be regarded, claim that the discovery of the existence of Life in mineral is fit to be ranked with the work of Darwin. And it is reported that Prof. Shaler, of the chair of Geology at Harvard University, declares that the Unity of life is the greatest discovery of the nineteenth century.

All of the recent discoveries apparently tend to the one goal. The more thorough the investigation of the aspects of nature the more closely they are seen to approach each other. The infinite Diversity in nature was that which formerly fixed the attention of the investigator. Its infinite Unity is the marvel which now excites his admiration. Prof. Ludwig Buchner, "Appleton's Popular Science Monthly," Feb. 1898, dealing with scientific progress in this century, mentions that "the unity and immortality of Force" have been demonstrated. Nor has science rested there. We have seen how the unity of Matter, and of Life have also been accepted. In the article just mentioned, Prof. Buchner calls our attention to the fact that "Spectrum analysis, also, in conjunction with the curious double stars has brought about the highly important conviction of the unity of what is to us the visible universe." All these conclusions of science but lead up to that more profound unity suggested by Tyndall (Scientific Use of Imagination) in the words "Supposing we had been brought to regard them" (spirit and matter) "as equally worthy and equally wonderful, to consider them in fact as two opposite faces of the self-same mystery."

In a chapter written for the purpose of showing that Religion and Science were not essentially antagonistic, Mr. Herbert Spencer (First Principles, Chapter on "The Reconciliation"), points to this great fact of unity as the common ground of the two. His words are as follows: "We are obliged to regard every phenomenon as a manifestation of some Power by which we are acted upon; phenomena being, so far as we can ascertain, unlimited in their diffusion, we are obliged to regard the Power as omnipresent; and criticism teaches us that this Power is wholly incomprehensible. In this consciousness of an Incomprehensible Omnipresent Power, we have just that consciousness on which religion dwells. And so we arrive at that point where Religion and Science coalesce. * * * The final outcome of their mutual criticism can be nothing else than an entire agreement on this deepest and widest of all truths."

Gems of Thought.

Think of the egotism of a man who believes that an infinite being wants his praise.—Ingersoll.

Who can estimate what the world loses in the bright intellects who cower before popular prejudice.—J. S. Mill.

When you wish to know if a man aspires to personal power, watch how he bears himself toward the church.—Edgar Quinet.

The religions of this world are numerous and various, but the priesthood is the same in all places—a fact which doubtless goes to prove that it is of divine origin—Voltaire.

It is certain that the discoveries of universal law have reduced prayer among us to an anachronism. It makes no difference whatever whether the prayer be for a moral or an intellectual or a physical benefit.—Conway.

Various and desperate have been the expedients and suppositions resorted to in order to reconcile the conception of an immutable, all-wise, all foreseeing God, with that of a father who is turned from his course by the prayers of his creatures. But all such efforts are, and are felt to be, hopeless failures. They involve the assertion and negation of the same proposition in one breath. —Greg.

RELIGION.

As Heard in "Voices from Many Hilltops."

Religion to be of any value to humanity, must be practical, must be that which enters into the daily life, making mankind honest, truthful and just toward all. When the children of the land are taught to save themselves, to build their own temples in the land of souls, a great amount of the wrong that now exists will roll away as fog from the earth-land valleys; but just so long as they can rely on the merits of another, and feel secure in his power to save the lowest without any effort on their part except the exercise of a little weak faith that has been dragged through the filth of a life that records no humanity, no purity, no fulfillment of moral obligations either to self or the world—I say, just so long as such conditions exist, where man is made to believe that he can earn heaven at the last gasp, that begins with a curse and ends with a prayer, just so long will the surging tides of life bear tokens of cruelty and dissensions, just so long will the records of the land breathe of injustice, centered in and wrought from selfishness. Man must be taught the honest fact, that he lays his own foundation and builds thereon, and dwells in the home he thus builds, and has right to no other. He who reaches any heaven wins it, and not only wins it, but builds it and hangs the gates thereof. The grant of eternal peace, through faith, is the greatest license to wrongdoing the world has ever known. It has opened hells in the here and hereafter; it holds in its folds the very essence of Catholicism. Make man responsible for his acts and the wrongs of earth-land will record a rapid decrease; but pamper him with the idea of full forgiveness, make him believe that after a life of inhumanity and selfishness he can by signing the article called faith be immediately transformed and transported, and made to sit down at the right hand of Deity, there to pass judgment on the millions who in all things have been true, even godlike in their humanity, but who saw nothing but child's play in the flimsy web woven in the very loom of selfishness—do all this for man, and the wrongs of the present will in time duplicate themselves in your very midst.

How anyone, even children, can fail to see the mixture of incongruities handed them as elixir of eternal life, is a mystery. I verily believe the animal whereon Balaam rode, and which was considered worthy of note in the records of the day, could give voice (if he ever did what was recorded) to sounder theology, and more sensible conclusions, else he would be unworthy a place among the long-eared race.

The churches have done what they could, if not in the direction of deep spiritual unfoldment, and to sum up the efforts and results, they will be found to read thus: Many blind ones sought to lead many times their number equally blind and willing to be thus led, and all fell into a ditch, where the present finds them, and from which none escape except by the light of spiritual truth, that will and must light all paths from the beginning to the end. The greatest wonder is that in the light that ceases not to fall with far-reaching illuminating power so few make an effort to extricate themselves, but screening the eyes of the soul, seem to rejoice in the very shadows of the land wherein they dwell.—Extract from "Voices from Many Hilltops."

Spirit Animals, Do They Exist?

Yes, most emphatically. I will relate a little incident that occurred to me several months ago. One evening while having my sitting for development, I had the light turned down, but not so low but what all objects in the room were discernible, and several feet in advance of me was a chair. To my surprise two very pretty half-grown kittens jumped upon the chair and commenced to play, and rub against each other in such a loving way, I thought I never had seen two such loving kittens before. I watched them several minutes when they gradually faded from my sight. I was somewhat surprised, and wondered what the object could be in those two kittens appearing to me, for I did not seem to recognize them. The next morning at the breakfast table I made the remark to my wife and my little twelve-year-old daughter that I had seen the nicest kittens I believed I ever had seen, they were such loving little creatures. My wife and daughter then commenced to quiz me as to what they looked like. I gave them a description and before I got through the little girl said: "Why, papa, don't you remember them—my Spotty and Snow? They were both poisoned and died within a few days of each other." That happened three years previous to this time. I don't think I ever would have thought of those two kittens if it had not been on account of my wife and daughter recognizing them.

I have seen the spirits of other animals and fowls fully as plainly as the kittens. I remember about a year ago I was sitting in the parlor with my family when all at once I saw my wife going towards a spring with a bucket on her arm and a large goose following after her. "Why," I said, "Ida, where did you ever live that you carried water from a spring and had a goose to follow you?"

"Why," she said, "describe the goose to me; what color is the one you see?"

I gave her a description of the goose, and after I got through she said, "You have given me a very good description of my Old Dickie goose and also of the spring." She informed me that this was the only one she raised out of a brood of ten, the other nine got drowned in a severe rain storm.

Now if the spirits of animals and fowls do not exist after what we call death, pray tell me what it was that flashed so vividly before me, if it was not the spirit of Old Dickie Goose?

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The Fraternal Spiritualist Society has discontinued its Sunday meetings until next fall.

Will C. Hodge will be in Beloit, Wis., June 10, at Brodhead, June 17, and in the vicinity of Dayton, Wis., June 24, where the friends will hold their annual picnic and gove meeting. He has open dates from June 25 until July 15, after which he is engaged for camp work until September 1. Is open for engagements for the fall and winter months. Address 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ills.

E. E. Carpenter writes from Detroit, Mich.: "I am pleased to say to Mrs. Marian Carpenter's friends that she is rapidly convalescing from an eight weeks' illness, and expects to be able to fill all camp engagements. Her engagements are as follows: From June 14 to 17, at Bankson Lake, Mich.; June 24, Bellevue, Mich., grove meeting; July 1 to 19, Briggs Park Camp, Grand Rapids, Mich.; July 22 to 26, Central Lake, Mich.; July 28 to August 2, Maple Dell, Ohio; August 5 to 10, Vicksburg, Mich.; August 12 to 16, Clinton, Iowa; August 19 and 20, Lily Dale, N. Y.; August 23 to 26, Lake Brady, Ohio; September 2, Paulding Ohio, grove meeting; September 9 to 15, Marshalltown, Iowa; October, Indianapolis, Ind.; November and December, Grand Rapids, Mich.; March and April, Philadelphia, Pa."

The New Orleans Times-Democrat says: "During the past few days one of the ghosts that are said to haunt various parts of Hampton Court Palace has reappeared," says the London Pall Mall Gazette. "The palace authorities have been informed by an artist that, while engaged in sketching old Flemish tapestry in the 'guard watching chamber,' a spectre hand, white and delicate and richly jeweled, has persistently intruded between him and the tapestry. On the last appearance of the phantom he made a hurried sketch of the hand and also of a diamond ring on the forefinger. The phantom hand (writes a correspondent) is believed to be that of Queen Catherine Howard, one of the wives of King Henry VIII., whose spirit is described as the most fearful of all the apparitions that wander within the walls of the historic building. History states that Catherine one day escaped from a room to which she had been confined by order of the King, and on hastening across the haunted gallery was seized by the guards and, despite her shrieks and protestations, removed to her room. Since then the scene has, it is said, been re-enacted repeatedly by a tall figure clad in white."

G. W. Webster writes from Lake Helen, Fla.: "I read many articles in your paper with much interest and rejoice in your success. Many things said and done by many people who call themselves Spiritualists interest me but little, and I think are of little value to the world, but the spiritual wave that has swept over the world during the last fifty years has effectually removed the old conditions, and I believe is making and will continue to make better conditions for mankind. We have been living in Florida for the last seventeen years, in the healthiest locality I have ever found, and I know of nothing that would induce us to change our residence. Our home is on land adjoining the Southern Cassadaga Camp Ground. We are still trying to do what we can to help our spirit friends to lift humanity to a higher level, and rejoice in the success of every good work."

The Toronto Globe says: "The personal friends of the Rev. Dr. B. F. Austin, M. A., ex-principal of Alma College, tendered him a reception last night in St. George's Hall, the occasion being the first anniversary of his trial before the London Annual Conference of the Methodist Church at Windsor and his expulsion from the ministry of the denomination, principally on account of his avowal in a sermon of a belief in Spiritualism. There was a large attendance and a very pleasant social evening was spent. Dr. Barnard, of Parkdale, and Dr. Wheeler, of Louisville, Ky., delivered addresses. At the close of the proceedings Dr. Austin returned the assemblage the warmest thanks in the language of the heart. He did not interpret their presence as meaning that they believed exactly as he did, but simply as an endorsement of the right of every man to think his own creed and speak out his own convictions. He thought it would be better for the churches and for the world if men had greater freedom in expressing their convictions. He had no regret in leaving orthodoxy, but rejoiced in the freedom of being allowed to seek the truth everywhere. He had the kindest feelings towards all the churches, and especially towards the Methodist Church, from which he had sprung. But the highest pulpit of orthodoxy would not tempt him to go back to the teaching of the old theology. (Applause.) Much interest was created during the evening by the exhibition of several specimens of messages written on slates by spiritual agencies, and of photographs of spiritual emanations. Among those present was Mr. Godbold, president of the Spiritualists' Association."

The Tribune, of Elberton, Ga., has the following: "Do you believe in Spiritualism? Do you believe that a man who never saw you before, or heard of you, could tell you your history—the principal events in your life—past and to come? Of course you don't. But there are people in Elberton who do, and they have as much sense and as much honesty as you possess. These questions are suggested by the presence in Elberton of Mr. Letford, the popular representative of H. E. Bucklen & Co., Chicago. He has a large scope of country to cover, and consequently comes to Elberton but once a year. On the occasion of each one of his visits for the past four or five years he has proven his spiritualistic powers to some of the most pronounced skeptics, including many of the most prominent men in our city."

Frank T. Ripley, test medium and speaker, has the first four Sundays of July, and all the Sundays of August open for engagement. Address all letters to him at 55 East Wayne street, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Carrie F. Weatherford, of Alaska, Mich., will fill date of July 22, at Columbus Camp in place of Anna L. Gillespie, resigned.

John A. Johnston will be at 241 Winchester avenu, Chicago, for the next two weeks before going to Clinton.

A lyceum worker writes: "On Sunday morning, May 20, at Springfield, Mo., Mrs. M. Theresa Allen, lecturer and author of 'The Medium's Guide,' organized a children's progressive lyceum (Mr. Allen was temporarily absent from the city). This lyceum is officered by the young people exclusively—married people being ineligible to office. It has a membership of about thirty-five persons, including children of all ages, from the golden locks of childhood to the silvery locks of old age. From present indications, it is evident that these young people intend to make their's an up-to-date lyceum, and an instructive adjunct of Mr. and Mrs. Allen's general Spiritualistic work in this city. Following are the duly elected officers of this organization: Miss Mary McCready, conductor; Mr. Orlen T. Dixon, guardian; Mr. R. D. Huxley, secretary; Miss Ruby McCreary, treasurer; Mr. W. J. Huxley librarian; Miss Mabel L. Dixon, musical director; Miss Fannie Hendrick, Miss Knight and Mr. Reece, guards. Copies of Brother Tom Clifford's paper, The Lyceum, were generously distributed last Sunday by Mrs. Allen, to the delight of the children. The regular Sunday night Spiritualistic services, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Allen, are well attended."

Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, whose headquarters are in Fort Worth, Texas, was in the city last week. She had just returned from Bankson Lake, Mich., where she had an engagement to lecture. She reports a good attendance there and great interest. Last Sunday she lectured at Bloomington, Ill. The first Sunday in July she lectures at Breedsville, Mich., and the second Sunday at Texas. She then goes East, to fill engagements at the camps, and will be accompanied by Lucy Ault, a musical prodigy.

Twenty-five cents for adults and fifteen cents for children, will entitle you to a reserved seat to hear an impersonated reading on the story of "Ben Hur," illustrated with 82 life-size views on canvas, and a chance to see and hear the youngest child entertainer of the century, in her recitations, posing and pantomime. This entertainment will be given by Lee Norie Claman, assisted by Baby Claman. Stewart avenue Universalist church, 65th and Stewart avenue, June 22, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Russell says that Baby Claman is a prodigy.

P. J. Culhane writes from Hamilton, Canada: "We had the pleasure of attending a materializing circle; Mrs. Wright was the medium. Everything was eminently satisfactory. She is indeed a wonderful lady. She gives meetings in this city, June 6, 7, 8 and 10. It is the writer's opinion that there is a field here for an extensive cultivation of Spiritualism, and the forming of a society. Perhaps I am over sanguine and enthusiastic in this matter; if so it is entirely attributable to my unbounded admiration for the principles of Spiritualism and the indisputable testimony adduced at the three circles which I had the unalloyed pleasure of participating in."

Ben F. and Mattie E. Hayden write from Atlantic City, Iowa: "Since writing we have been at Webster City, where we held two meetings to highly interested audiences. At present we are stopping at the home of genial Brother Harvey. We find quite a number of people here who are interested in the science of life. We have secured the G. A. R. Hall in which we will hold our first meetings, Sunday, the 10th inst. We will remain here until the guides feel our mission here has been fulfilled. We will answer calls to lecture week night evenings, within fifty miles of here on very reasonable terms. Friends, let us hear from you. We would like to work in Nebraska and Kansas and solicit correspondence with societies or parties desiring our services. Mrs. H. will go anywhere near for train fare and entertainment. I will make very reasonable terms in addition for my services as inspirational lecturer. Will go separate or together as the friends desire. Mail addressed 611 Spruce street, Atlantic City, Iowa, will reach us. Everywhere we go we meet the cheerful face of The Progressive Thinker and hear only words of highest praise for it and its editor."

Virginie Barrett writes: "The friends should address me at Bonfield, Ont. Canada, where I shall rest in the country for a time, and then go to camp. I closed two months' successful labor for the Second Spiritual Church of Allegheny, Pa., and I am open for engagements for fall and winter."

The Indianapolis Sentinel says: "The annal picnic picnic of the Indiana State Spiritualist Lyceum was held at the Chesterfield camp grounds, Sunday, June 10."

The Detroit (Mich.) News says: "Gossips in the neighborhood of the late Daniel Scotten's house and abandoned tobacco factory are much excited over reports that the old man's ghost haunts the scene of his former labors. The story is told that a month ago at midnight two servants employed at the house were passing through the roadway to Porter street, when the figure of a man, white and terrible, came out from behind the barn. To their excited imaginations it appeared to be the ghost of Daniel Scotten, but on his face was a scowl as he turned and gazed at the chimneys of the disused factory. With loud screams the servants made tracks for the street, and notified Patrolman Purcell, who examined the grounds, but could find no ghost. Since then it is claimed that the wraith has appeared several times."

BOOK REVIEWS.

Talmagean Inanities, Incongruities, Inconsistencies and Blasphemies; a Review of Rev. T. DeWitt and Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage's Oft-repeated Attacks upon Spiritualism. By Moses Hull.

The Talmages, father and son, present a very forlorn and battered appearance after being subjected to Moses Hull's analysis and criticism. The subject matter of this pamphlet proves the aptness of its title, for it clearly demonstrates the positive "Inanities, Incongruities, Inconsistencies and blasphemies" of the Talmages in their attacks upon Spiritualism. No Spiritualist can read it without many an appreciative smile and nod of approval of the righteous yet gentlemanly and scholarly castigation given the unscrupulous clerical vilifiers of Spiritualists and Spiritualism.

Thousands of copies ought to be purchased by Spiritualists, not only for home reading, but to place in the hands of good church people, many of whom would quietly enjoy its perusal, and learn much more than the Talmages tell them about the Bible and Spiritualism. It would be to them a veritable eye-opener.

It can be had for 10 cents a copy at the office of The Progressive Thinker.

PSYCHOMETRY.

Are the Psychometer's Experiences Reliable?

To the Editor:—The article on the above subject by R. B. Span, in issue of May 12, is all true—so far as the experience of the psychometer is concerned. But is it all true what the psychometer experiences?

Facts warrant us to believe that psychometry is an exact science. If that which can be proved is true, why not all that which cannot be, as, for example, reincarnation, or the prehistoric past? Psychometers say they know and believe the latter to be true because the first proves it. Or shall we only accept that which comforts with our special liking?

The writer of this has passed through the whole gamut of psychometric sensations, emotions, sights, flights, convolutions, etc., and has been generally correct in his delineations—relatively speaking, if not absolutely—but is as far away from an ipse dixit declaration as to the truth of his unproved experiences as ever. Yet many will accept the prehistoric visions and regard that on reincarnation as visionary. Neither can be proved by investigation as a man's character can be. Why accept one and not the other? Is it perhaps because we dislike to be reincarnated?

An intelligent gentleman once said to us: "The idea of living forever is horrible to me; it cannot be true!"

Does his dislike of immortality make it non est?

Materialism proves to its satisfaction that there is no future life to man. Does this make materialists right?

A non-sensitive cannot conceive of the possibility of inspiration. It has no existence for him, and he therefore does not believe it true.

Some mediums have keener sensibility than others. May not some, therefore, have higher revelations than others, and through it know that reincarnation is true, as they positively know that they possess mediumship or the gift of inspiration? If it is true our disbelief will not efface it. Spirits assert it, but that is not every medium's gauge. All experienced mediums analyze their inspirations by a still higher gift. Some term it psychometry, others intuition, some soul-knowledge—an individual perception beyond that which is impressed on it by spirits.

We are not endeavoring to prove reincarnation true, but questioning how much of medial effects can be accepted as true. ARTHUR F. MILTON.

HORSE THOUGHTS.

Does Man Enter Spirit Life, as Well as Horses?

I am somewhat puzzled by the solution given by those who maintain that clairvoyant vision of the lower animals in spirit life is delusive, while they accept those of human spirits as genuine. To say that spirits differ in spirit life on this question is to me very remarkable. We are reminded that all kinds of opinions exist here among mundane people, and then are flippantly asked, "then why not in spirit life?" First let us keep to the issue. Do they thus differ as to mundane affairs? I have never yet heard of man, woman or child so ignorant as to doubt or deny that there are animals of the lower order on earth. Then there is the argument that if there were animals these might sting us, bite us and annoy us! Well, do they not do all of that here? And are we not told that spirit life is in all respects similar to this?

But furthermore, is it necessary that when the fleshly tenement of our pet dog is cast off he should still desire to pursue the shade of poor tabby? Are we to suppose that the physical virus of the bee and wasp must necessarily adhere to the spirit? Or, is it even necessary that these other animals should pass into the same degree of spirit life as man?

Might we not easily conceive of the possibility of a proximus state from which they could be called by human spirits? The idea of accepting as authority clairvoyant views in spirit life delusive as to lower animals but correct as to all things else looks to me a little forced.

A few evenings ago I was reading one of Dr. Peebles' articles in which he touched on the delusive character of these visions, when I became very drowsy, and finally passed into dreamland. In my dream a nice young colt was just questioning its dam: "Mamma, is it true that people pass to spirit life just the same as we do?"

"What a question, child; of course not. When we pass away from this life we shall be free from the annoying bondage of man; nor shall we need him any more. No, child, only horses enter the spirit world. What makes you ask such silly questions?"

"Why, mamma, Uncle Mike and Aunt Peg were saying to-day that when in his sleeping fits White Charley said he saw dead Master Jenks with his arm around Brother Dick's neck, who died last fall, so they said men must go to spirit life just the same as horses."

"Dear me, child, why, as to your poor Brother Dick, no doubt they saw him, but as to old Master Jenks, they made his form appear to be there just to help identify your Brother Dick."

"Well, that is nearly like what Uncle Mike said; he said that because Master Jenks had been with my Brother Dick so much that his magnetism had become part of Jenks and so they called it sycolicky or something like that."

"You mean psychometry, child—that is true. You can rest assured, child, we shall be freed from the tyrant man in spirit life. We shall not have to bear his burdens any longer."

"Aunt Peggie said perhaps he might not need to have us bear his burdens then. Maybe he would find some better way of traveling and riding then."

"Aunt Peggie talks nonsense, child; now go to sleep and don't let such silly ideas bother your coltish head."

Here my paper had caught fire from the lamp and I awoke with a start. I then commenced this article while my memory was fresh, but now it is finished, and I send it to The Progressive Thinker. B. R. ANDERSON.

IN THE FIELD.

Notes of Interest from G. H. Brooks.

It has been a long time since I have sent any word of my work to the many friends and readers of The Progressive Thinker. It has been impossible for me to write, owing to my being so very busy. I have never had a busier season than the one just passed, and yet my engagements were only in two vember and December; in Milwaukee, Wis. I was in Pittsburg October, Novelmber and December; in Milwaukee, January, February, March, April and May. Both of these engagements have been more than pleasant, not a discord to jar the harmony of the engagement. I have been with the Milwaukee society six years in succession, much of the time a long engagement—last year six months, this year five. I feel more at home there than in any other city, and to me Milwaukee is one of the finest cities on the globe, and I can see a great future for it.

It is not the easiest city, in one sense, to sustain a spiritual gathering, largely of a class who are amusement seekers, theatres all open afternoon and evening, many of the saloons, music halls, and everywhere on all sides every effort made to amuse man. Spiritual ideas are not sought after as in other places, and yet there has been an interest in the work, a very good attendance at the meetings and socials, and the Unity Spiritual Society stands to-day as well as any organized body in the city. The press treats us with courtesy, often giving synopsis of the lecture, and granting every favor they can. Such was not the case six years ago. Many other things I might mention, but it is needless to do so. Unity Society is very much alive, and will resume its labors again in the fall.

I am open for engagements after November. October and November I go to Pittsburg again; beyond that I have nothing. I am resting up at my home, preparatory to my work at Lily Dale as chairman again. While I am at home will respond to calls for funerals. Send all mail and telegrams to my home address, 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill. I have done a good deal of missionary work besides my regular work, have visited a good many places in Wisconsin, attended two mass meetings—in Chicago and Stevens Point, Wis., and everywhere I have been I have been well received. More than all I have found a great interest in the subject, and a class of people attracted to the meetings who have never attended spiritual meetings before.

I feel there is a great upliftment in the work, and there is more of a constructiveness than ever before that, instead of tearing down there is a building up. Thus it must ever be if we expect to reach the people.

"WORDS THAT BURN."

A Psychic Novel, by Lida B. Browne.

To the Editor:—Perhaps some of your readers may be interested to learn that a psychic novel from my pen is now being published and will be ready for sale in a few weeks.

The scenes of this realistic story are laid in England and America, and the characters are depicted in a way that makes you feel acquainted with them at once and enter into their joys and sorrows as you would those of an intimate friend. The title gives one a clue to the plot—that of angry words which burn deep into the soul until forgiveness is sought and obtained.

The speaker of these words is Sir William Percival, a haughty nobleman, who disinherited his daughter for marrying an American gentleman whom she loved. His son was also cast off for opposing his wishes and crossing the ocean to visit his sister. When alone and helpless in his elegant mansion, with no one but servants to wait on him, Sir William regretted his actions, but pride kept him from writing to his children. Death claimed him, but his spirit could not progress until forgiveness was obtained. His experiences in the spirit life are vividly narrated.

This nobleman's son has a romance of his own which takes him to the far west. Scenes in and around Chicago and Denver are realistically described, and the reader is taken in the story to the top of Pike's Peak and down into a mine. There is also depicted a storm at sea.

The book has a high moral tone; the family fireside is exalted, and experiences are told which are both instructive and entertaining. Some of the latest inventions and discoveries, as well as the new thought of the day are woven into the story. It is thoroughly constructive and antagonizes no system of religion.

It is printed in large type on excellent paper, is cloth bound, and has my portrait and autograph in as frontispiece. It is a large 12mo, and has fifty chapters. The book may be ordered through The Progressive Thinker, or direct of me. The retail price is $1.50, but those who will send me $1 now before it is out of the hands of the binder, I will mail them the book promptly when it is out. What Materialism Means.

Everywhere it seems to be the mission of spirit to formulate; that is, to govern matter and live in harmony with it; and because of this harmonious association we have symmetrical forms, beauty and fragrance throughout nature. Discord entering, death and disintegration follow; death meaning inability of the spirit longer to maintain or govern the form.

So it is in the social life in which the social spirit has to do with material things and forms; but never yet has society adopted the perfect or harmonious form, and never will until we exalt the social spirit and subjugate material things and considerations to the spirit.

In no sense is this a plea for self-denial or abnegation. Quite the contrary, it is simply a suggestion that matter be made thoroughly subject to spirit, and if Spiritualists cannot do this, who can? Certainly not those who believe that spirit is subject to environment, which is to say, to matter.

The case as it stands is not so complicated as might at first appear. To live on this plane of life the spirit must have an income or wages; let the wages take what form they please. Not only so, spirit is all that should enjoy wages, for the universal spirit, of which all things are parts, is the spirit of labor, which is the spirit of love or God. The entire universe labors solely to produce symmetrical, harmonious forms; which means in our case, honest men and women. Paul saw this when he declared the golden rule the all-sufficient form of law, for the golden rule is the simplest law of honesty, or balance.

But like the materialists that we are, we have endowed matter as well as spirit with wages. There are certain forms of property or matter that are always in good demand, at wages which never stop, night or day, crop or no crop. Men, women and children may starve for work and wages; virtue may be bartered for what it will bring on the counters of ignorance and vice; property must have its wages, come what will. If the wages are not to be had at home, we enter into wars of conquest and make foreign "investments," under the hypocritical banners of civilization and "benevolent assimilation," and the missionary and soldier seem to be the advance agents in this nefarious work. Apparently property is God.

The only way I can live without working is to live on the wages of property. Can any one point out another way, except I steal, inherit, or become the object of charity?

And even so-called Spiritualists are unable to detect the disastrous effects that must inevitably follow this time-honored worship of mammon, much less discover the simple remedy. Is it not evident that property can be accumulated, while of energy there is not an ounce that has not always existed. How, then, can the spirit of labor pay the wages of property and continue to live on earth? It cannot be done, as each disappearing civilization testifies. "The laborer is worthy of his hire," but the wages of property are the wages of sin, and "The wages of sin is death."

We learn only by contrast; we know good only through knowledge of evil. Just so we become Spiritualists, in fact, when we comprehend what materialism really is. JAS. T. R. GREEN.

A CARD.

The principals of Belvidere Seminary would respectfully inform their friends and the public generally that this institution will be open during the summer and early autumn for the accommodation of children and adults who seek freedom from business cares or the excitement of social and fashionable life. THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose graves stones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed, to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Q. When were lucifer matches first introduced?

A. Matches were invented by Isaac Holden, and introduced about 1833. Before that time if a fire had to be kindled resort was had to flint and steel, the spark produced by striking them together being carefully received on tinder, and touching the burning tinder with a sulphur match. It is to be remarked that we cannot appreciate the convenience, and even necessity of the match, so common we give it no thought.

Mrs. N. S.: Having endeavored for so long a time and faithfully to develop your mediumship, without gaining desired results, there is no encouragement to proceed farther under the same conditions. If possible, arrange to have some one sit with you, or better, a circle of several members.

R. L. Talcott: Q. Is it not strange that Spiritualists and Freethinkers so often employ ministers of the gospel on funeral occasions, when a little effort would secure speakers of their own belief?

A. It may not be of least significance to the dead, but it is a satisfaction to the living to have the life and motives of departed friends set before the public in a true light. The spirit is supposed to be conscious of passing events and to know the thoughts of friends, and what the speaker says, it cannot be enjoyable to hear its beliefs attacked; and all it regarded of spiritual value denounced, and the doctrines of Jesus and his atoning blood made the all in all.

At a recent funeral of a man who had been a Spiritualist for thirty years, and a medium of remarkable power, the Congregational minister employed by his wife, who was a member of that church, began his discourse by briefly alluding to the life of the deceased. He said, he was "informed that the departed was an upright citizen, a kind father, a loving husband. He had never belonged to the church. What his state now was in the future life was not for him to say. He was not there to judge the dead, but warn the living." He then showed that Christ was the way and the life, and that belief in him was absolutely essential to salvation. I thought that the weeping wife and children would receive slight consolation from a logic that consigned the departed to perdition.

At another funeral of an aged pioneer, a good and unselfish man, though somewhat rough and uncouth, who had been in early life a Universalist, but for later years had been what is characteristically styled a "Nothingarian," the Methodist preacher seized the opportunity to hold him up as a warning before the world. He began by reading the hymn for congregational singing:

> "Behold the aged sinner goes,
> Laden with heavy sins and woes,
> Down to the regions of the dead,
> With heavy curses on his head."

His sermon was in the same style, and if believed, would have driven a sensitive hearer frantic.

The abused spirit would have been justified in materializing to express his scorn.

Another aged pioneer became alarmed at the prospects of such untruths being repeated at his death, said to a lecturer: "I want you to pledge yourself to speak at my funeral, for I don't want any minister lying over me when I have no chance to talk back." To be assured, he made a clause in his will setting aside a certain amount to meet the expenses. He had escaped the old belief himself, but he had not succeeded in taking his wife with him and his children had been allowed to attend Sunday-school and the church, and he was alone. When he died, his well-known wishes were disregarded, and the family preacher called in to officiate and save the lost soul by prayer.

While the funeral should not be made the occasion to exploit any belief or faith, as it so often is by gospel ministers, the politic speaker may do a wonderful missionary work by presenting the only consistent view of the life to come; a balm for the wounded hearts, a strong staff on which the sorrowing may lean, in the assurance that they who are mourned as dead, live in a higher life unchanged in affection.

After all it is not so very strange that children disregard the expressed wishes of their parents, when the parents have allowed the children to grow up under the domination of the Sunday-school and the church, and make no persistent effort to educate them in their own belief. It is, however, strange that Spiritualists make so little effort to inculcate in their children the views of life and death, which are so priceless to them.

Dr. Geo. W. Lusk: Q. I have for 30 years been healing, and now exhausted, no one seems able to return the favor. What shall I do to regain my strength?

A. Healing by magnetic or spiritual methods, if the operator is not careful to guard himself, is exhaustive of vital force. In some cases there is an interchange of magnetism, and the operator takes on the symptoms of the subject or patient. Often the demand is so great that the operator has not time for recuperation, or most unwisely thinks that he has not, and thus by attempting to heal too many patients, deplete them by false claims, and is unjust to himself.

Once vitally depleted, the restoration is not easily gained. The healer is of that temperament which gives and does not readily receive. He must look mainly to hygienic methods for recovery. First carefully guard against every drain of vital force. A chaste life is the foundation of restoration. At least eight hours of sleep in a room thoroughly ventilated, pure water, and wholesome food are the essential conditions.

Wheatlet, oatmeal, bread in various forms, with fruits, form the best diet. Exercise not to reach weariness, and rest as long as the feeling of exhaustion and lassitude remains. It is far easier and more desirable to keep vitality normal, than to restore it after it is lost.

T. P., Passadena: Q. At a late meeting in this city, the medium gave tests and George Washington, Thomas Paine, Robt. G. Ingersoll and General Sterling Price claimed to be present. I see from the papers that it is very common for Ingersoll to be at all the seances in the country, at a dozen or a hundred at the same time. He like other "great names," seems omnipresent. How shall we explain the coming of such great spirits, and the incongruity of the puerility of their communications?

A. With due allowance for the difficulties in the way of perfect expression through the medium, and influence of the circle, a spirit communication ought to bear with itself evidences of its source. If the medium is ignorant, and rude of speech, a reflection of these should be expected, and neither incriminate the medium nor invalidate the claim made for the communication as to its source. Yet there should be expected at least a suggestion of the method of thought of the spirit claiming to communicate. The probability is always against the coming of such distinguished spirits. They have as busy lives as when in earth-life. There are multitudes ready to influence mediums, on every occasion, and take advantage by every means available to attract attention. Hence the name, the continuous presentation of high claims is not the least proof of genuineness. Eliminating possible sources of error, there must remain a portion characteristic of the purporting spirit.

Ingersoll who cared so little for the extension of what he thought was true, that he never appeared in public unless exorbitantly paid for it, who held his books up to the full market price, has not probably so changed that he has given himself to the work of distributing himself in a score of places at the same time, and speaking to a few people gathered in parlors, or even indulging in speeches from the rostrum. If to this improbability be added puerility, incoherence, and sterility of thought, the conclusion may be safely reached that the eloquent Robert has not interfered.

If the members of circles, and mediums would be content with the ordinary names, the coming of such spirits as would visit them when on earth, their own relatives or friends, the results would be much more satisfactory. The probability of George Washington visiting a circle in some obscure neighborhood, is less than such a visit would be were he in earth life; but if the members are anxious for and demand "great names," and think an ordinary friendly spirit unworthy of mention, they will receive "great names," and place themselves in connection with those who are misleading and irresponsible.

THROUGH THE MIST.

Through the mists of life, we mortals peer,
Striving hard to make the shadowy clear,

Seeking ever for the meaning true,
Seeking ever for the nearer view.

Why is that, and why, we ask, is this,
Some know naught but sorrow, some but bliss,

Some are rich, and many more are poor,
Is there, then, no justice that is sure?

Thus we strive to find some sovereign rule
That shall solve the problem of life's school.

Through the mists we grope, and groping grow
Puzzled more, with what we do not know.

Shadows hold us—shadows fold us round,
By their fleeting falsehoods we are bound.

Subtle tricksters seem the shades that dance
All about us, mocking in their glance.

Years are passing—age will soon be here—
Shall we never make life's questions clear?

Whence came we, and whither shall we go?
Who can answer—who can truly know?

Listen to the "still small voice" within,
Put away the outer strife and din;

Hold thou, then, sweet converse with thy soul,
Till life's inner pages do unroll—

Thou shalt see the darkest shadows kissed,
Thou shalt see the rainbow, through the mist.

On life's upper billows, let thy boat
Sail along—serenely let it float,

Till all doubt and question disappear,
In the pure and truth-filled atmosphere.

Put them by—the earthly cares that fret,
For success shalt crown thine efforts yet.

Thou shalt see thy life's illumined list.
That is shining just beyond the mist.

Glorious colors gild the bending sky,
Changing beauties ever passing by,

To the soul, that seeing, does insist,

NOT A SPIRITUALIST,

Yet Expresses His Views Freely.

I am not a Spiritualist, but I am a reader of your paper. In the last issue I read two articles, both coming from Spiritualists, concerning the Christ, which are so much at variance that I am prompted to write a few thoughts on the subject.

The first article I take notice of is one entitled "Another View Concerning Jesus of Nazareth." The author of this article gives the two opinions of him; one that he was a man, the other that he was God in the guise of a man. I agree with the writer when he says that he does not believe Jesus was, as is claimed, superior to natural law, for I believe that everything that was done by him and accounted miracles was done by the action of law which he understood; but when the author says that he should have been a married man in order to have rounded out his life, and thus have become a better exemplar of things pertaining to human life, I do not agree with him.

And right here comes the great contrast between the two articles of which I spoke. The other article is headed, "Before Abraham was I am," an inspirational lecture delivered by the guides of Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown. This article gives the truest idea of the real Christ of anything that I have ever seen in print. It takes away from the historical man Jesus the great superstitious belief in him as a God, or more properly speaking as, God, and gives to the spirit which animated him, which is the real Christ, the glory that has so long been given to Jesus by the orthodox church as the son of God and savior of the world through a special plan for the redemption of the human race whereby he was required to give up his life to appease the wrath of an angry father who was willing to accept the sacrifice of his only son and thus make him a scapegoat for the rest of humanity. I believe that Jesus was just what he claimed to be, the Son of God, but he never laid claim to being the only son of God; he spoke of his Father as being our Father too. He says: "Before Abraham was I am." This is plain that he did not mean himself as a man of flesh and blood, but that he meant that the spirit of love and willing sacrifice in order to benefit and save the race, which was his inner and real self, made him truly the son of God, and I believe it is possible for others to attain the same power of the spirit that he did by the same means that he used. He preached the truth, but it was not received then, and has been received only in a very small degree since, and the orthodox church, which claims to be the church of Christ, has so bound up and hidden the true Christ in the swaddling clothes of form, that instead of being the church of the true and living Christ, it is in reality the church of the historical man Jesus in part; I say, in part, because it has not even kept his teachings concerning the material life intact, but has added things which if he were here now he would disown.

I do not know enough about Spiritualism to make any comments, but there must be without doubt a great deal of truth in it, and if I may make so bold as to venture a little idea of my own to Spiritualists, for their consideration, I would say that the spirit of belittling the Christ which I see from so many, does not do justice to the truth. Such as saying: "He was a very ordinary kind of a fellow, and should have been married to make his life full and rounded out," does no good, I am sure; it seems to me to show in the writers of such articles a narrow mind, which is not willing to accept anything because it is professedly orthodox. Why should Spiritualists care from what quarter the evidence comes, as I understand that Spiritualists are the people who want the truth, are the true seekers after truth. These efforts to belittle the Christ would seem out of place in people who earnestly desire the truth and nothing but the truth, because, say what you will, the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth show forth the finest gems of wisdom that have ever been uttered by any man of whom there is any record. Even Spiritualists unconsciously quote from the wisdom that he uttered. It will be admitted by all that the wisdom of his teachings has never been surpassed, and until it is surpassed why try to belittle him and his teachings?

It seems to me that the time for the truth to be made manifest is coming nearer and nearer, and that the dissensions now going on in the churches over the inhuman and ungodlike creeds and confessions of faith is the time when people who have the truth can give it to others. Butflet us keep down the bars of bigotry, and accept truth from whatever source it comes.

"Before Abraham was, I am." I am means I am, and you are, and according to the amount of the spirit of "I am" that is imbibed by us, so shall our usefulness be measured. The order of Melchisedek and the spirit of the living Christ (not the historical man Jesus) and Truth are one and the same thing and before Abraham was "I am" and will continue to be.

God is the highest pinnacle of good, the acme of all things good, the highest wisdom and the greatest power, and man is the highest in the order of material manifestation, and I believe in the Divinity of Jesus the Christ, and because of that I believe in the Divinity of man. "I am in the Father and the Father is in me." "I and the Father are one." "The Father is greater than I." In the sense that Jesus was the one to open up the way and show to others the way to escape from sensuality, was he not indeed the savior of the world?

THE HINDOO MONK.

New Light on Swami Vivekananda.

FROM DR. J. M. PEEBLES, OF BATTLE CREEK—THE SPIRITUALIST AND GLOBE TROTTER WHO HAS WRITTEN SEVERAL BOOKS—THE YOGI PHILOSOPHY—SOME ASCETIC SEANCES.

Dr. J. M. Peebles, noted traveler, lecturer and writer, and a thorough Spiritualist in belief, has recently permanently located in Battle Creek, Mich., says the Detroit News-Tribune. Forty years ago he was pastor of the Battle Creek Independent Church. Since that time he has traveled the world over, making one of his greatest aims the investigation in foreign lands of Spiritualism.

Much of the knowledge gained Dr. Peebles has put into his book, entitled "Three Journeys Around the World; or Travels in the Pacific Islands, New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, Egypt and other Oriental Countries." This work is one volume of over 450 pages, is unique from the fact that the narrative of his travels is thickly spiced with spiritualistic incidents gathered in many lands. Dr. Peebles here touches upon spirit intercourse among the Chinese, the Hawaiians, the Fijis, the Russians, the East Indians, the Australians and almost every other race under the sun.

It will doubtless be of interest to Michigan people to know what Dr. Peebles has to say of the Hindoo Swami Vivekananda, who has several times journeyed through this State lecturing to large and cultivated audiences. Of this erstwhile popular swami he writes:

"It greatly amused the Theosophists, and the cultured Brahmins of India, as well as interested myself to see how Unitarians, Universalists, Freethinkers and some Spiritualists got wild over this swami, 'the great Hindoo Brahmin,' who by the way is not a Brahmin; and, further, cannot become a Brahmin except through death and rebirth into a Brahmin family. His real name is Norendra Nath Dutt. His father is a lawyer in Calcutta. This Swami Vivekananda, otherwise the sensational Mr. Nath Dutt, was educated at the Church of Scotland Institution, and studied law. He attended the Brahmo churches and acted upon the stage.

MR. DUTT NO ASCETIC.

"It was in 1889 that Mr. Dutt, with several other Bengalese agreed to become Sannyasis, wandering Hindoo monks. The old original Sannyasi were supposed to abandon all worldly concerns, and to depend upon alms for support. They were ascetics. Some smeared their heads with ashes. Others, until the British police interfered, went entirely naked. But Mr. Dutt, believing in progression, founded a sort of new order, one more gay and festive. His early asceticism failed to follow him to England and America. His oriental garb of orange, crimson girdle, turbaned head and gorgeous outfit generally, though unauthorized by his order of monkhood, would, with his fluent English, naturally attract crowds in America."

Of the swami's book entitled "Rajah Yoga, or Lectures on the Yoga Philosophy," Dr. Peebles says: "The book is chiefly valuable for its omissions of the Yoga practice, the ridiculous Yoga postures, etc." Speaking of the eighty-four postures that the Yogis assume, Dr. Peebles says that one of the most important is as follows: The right foot should be placed on the left thigh, and the left foot on the right thigh; the hands crossed and the two great toes held firmly together; the chin bent down on the chest, and in this posture the eyes should be directed to the tip of the nose. This is called Padmassana, the lotus posture. * * The Yogi state is called Samadhi, and in this state it is said that fire will not burn, water will not drown, nor the deadly cobra bite Yogis."

Dr. Peebles relates that by such methods the Yogis pretend to develop telepathy, clairvoyance, and other psychic phenomena. He also says that a writer for the Melbourne (Australia) Daily Herald, said that there were 500 Spiritualistic mediums in that city. He then writes of the severity of the conditions imposed by one of these mediums regarding the seance room.

SEANCES NO FUN THERE.

All members of the circles, on the day of the seance must fast from breakfast until the evening seance, always strictly abstaining from tobacco and spirituous liquors. Each person was required to take a bath before entering the seance room. These regulations were "prescribed by the spirits themselves." He then declares that, with this preparation, the materialization of spirits was perfect. He adds:

"Upon one of these interesting occasions, the light in the room slightly subdued, I heard the independent voices of Stainton Moses and Frederic W. Evans, the Shaker elder, as natural as though in their own mortal bodies."

Dr. Peebles says: "How many seances are held in ill-ventilated rooms, by people with unbathed bodies, swine-stuffed stomachs, beer-soaked visceras, and tobacco-scented breaths—a very cesspool of physical and moral stench; and then ask the beautiful angels to come with loving messages. Heavens! Why, you give just the conditions for demons to come—demons and pretentious spirits, with lying lips and swelling words of flattery. Such seances are hotbeds and nurseries of obsession."

It is odd and picturesque to take up his book so well filled with stories of travel, and find it so thickly interspersed with Spiritualism.

KING OF SIAM'S FRIEND.

In personal appearance, Dr. Peebles is venerable, with snowy hair and beard, an intellectual head and face expressive of benevolence and high ideals. He is a genuine "Yankee," born in Whittingham, Vt., March 22, 1822. He has been personally identified with reform movements from their beginning, and acquainted with such men as Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison and others.

In 1869 Dr. Peebles was appointed by President Grant, United States Consul to Trebizonde, Asiatic Turkey, where he remained two years. He subsequently made lecturing tours around the world, and has published several books on Spiritualism. He has conducted a sanitarium in California and one in Texas. He was one of the organizers of the Order of Good Templars, and is a member of many brotherhoods of philosophy, arts and sciences in different countries. During his visit in Siam the king became attracted to him, and they became very good friends. Dr. Peebles is a vegetarian, not having eaten meat in twenty years, and has recently issued a book entitled "Death Defeated; or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young." He has also in press a work upon which he has spent much time and study: "The Vaccination Curse, a Menace to Personal Liberty."

Great Work by a Great Author.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. The Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young,

The book comprises a practical subject handled in a practical manner by a practical man. Even if people do not wish or expect to live here always, they should know how to live right and enjoy the life that belongs to them. This is undoubtedly the most useful book for the masses the Doctor has ever published, for it strikes at the root or cause of disease, and tells how to avoid it. 212 pages, cloth bound. Price, $1. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, And All Being.

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

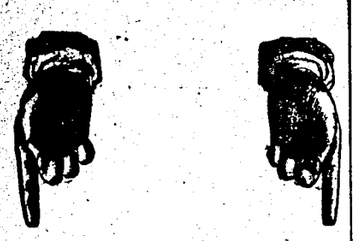
"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.



"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

TRUTH

The only way to find out who is the "Greatest Psychic Physician living" is to read what their patients say.

DR. O. E. WATKINS

never claims that he is the greatest physician living, or that he is the

GREATEST PSYCHIC.

He believes that there are hundreds of healers who are just as successful as he is, and he never yet has claimed that he is or was the best psychic, although twenty years before the public as the independent slate-writer with the record of not one person who ever accused him of fraud, ought to make the public THINK when they compare his claims to other so-called psychics.

DR. C. E. WATKINS

only desires those who are sick to remember that for over twenty years he has been before the public as a psychic, and over twelve years as a physician, and he never claims greater powers than others; but we believe he has a right to think he has as great gifts as those who claim so much.

Kindly read the following

TESTIMONIALS:

Dr. Watkins—Dear Sir:—My general health is very much improved. I am better and stronger than I ever thought I should be. You certainly have helped me. Hoping I may keep on improving another month, then I will feel quite young again, I remain, your patient,

MRS. M. E. CLARK.

Charlestown, Mass.

Dear Doctor:—Mrs. Ober is getting along nicely; she has lost thirty pounds, and can get around better than she could; lots of the neighbors don't believe she has been sick, because they do not see their dear doctor go into the house (yes, and every day). You have done for her what no other physician could do for her. When first taken, she could not walk out to the gate and back without lying down; now she can walk over a fourth of a mile. She thinks she is getting more like herself again. Respectfully, H. E. OBER.

Felchville, Vt.

Dear Doctor:—Please send another month's treatment. I am getting along fine this last month; in fact I hardly can think there is anything the matter with me. That ugly smothering feeling has almost entirely left me; heart is regular. Hope I will keep on until entirely cured. Yours respectfully,

W. C. ALWINE.

Abbottstown, Pa.

Dear Doctor Watkins:—Received your medicine: I am feeling very nicely, indeed I have not felt so well for years as I do now. I am a great deal stronger, rest splendidly nights; I presume you see it all. If all your patients get along as well as I have you have reason to feel glad, for as you know I feel overjoyed to think I have gained so rapidly. Good-bye. Your patient,

MRS. M. A. JOSLYN.

Millington, Mass.

Dear Dr. Watkins:—I am feeling fine; am getting along lovely. I have got where I can see the beautiful sunshine; but six weeks ago I could not see as much as a star. No one knows any better than myself how grateful I am. I will say to you, that awful ache has left my back, and now I am entirely free from piles, which I have not been for a long time. That bad feeling and fullness and gas in stomach and bowels are greatly improved. Thanking you for all you have done for me, I remain, yours with respect,

MRS. LYDIA TARR.

Rockland, Maine.

BIBLE ANECDOTES.

Considered in the Light of Reason.

If the story of creation is a true one, there was a mighty sight of work accomplished in those six days, and some of it seems quite unnecessary as well.

What could have been the design in making all the wild beasts which roam about over the earth, and the pestiferous vermin in every shape and form? But then, as the story goes the animals were all tame and docile, that it was only after the "fall from grace," they became wild and ferocious.

At the time of the great flood, it must have been a mighty job for Noah to collect two of each kind of every living creature which God had created and get them safely housed in his big ship before the storm descended, and as they had become wild and ungovernable, how could he manage them? And then why, I wonder, was it so necessary that every kind should be preserved? To think of them marching in, two by twos, from the monster ones down to the hyenas, wild cats, snakes, lizards, toads, and all the various tormenting insects! It's a pity most of them had not been left outside to drown, no more to be reproduced.

There's the account of Sodom and Gomorrah being destroyed by a shower of fire and brimstone sent down by the Creator because of the wickedness of the people—the only righteous ones being Lot and his family, whom God warned to get out before the catastrophe took place, which he did, but his wife, looking back to see once more the place which had been her life-long home was transformed into a pillar of salt. I should think stone would have been better, but possibly it was a peculiar kind of salt, which could not be dissolved under the influence of heavy rains, which doubtless they were sometimes blest with in that country, as we are not, here in Los Angeles.

The story of Jacob stealing the blessing which belonged to his elder brother Esau, was about as cruel as anything contained in the sacred (?) volume. You see I take it literally, just as the historians recorded it.

When I was young, and believed everything in that book was true, really it used to make me shed tears to think how bad Esau felt, and how he pleaded with his poor old father for a portion of his dying blessing and was refused. To think of the fraud which Rebecca played, and the lies that she told in order to secure the blessing for her favorite boy was shameful and most cruel. Isaac was totally blind and very aged, and knew that his end was fast approaching, and before it came he wished to bless his elder son Esau, so, to thwart his plans, she sends him out to "hunt venison, that the old man may have a feast." Then she kills a kid and takes the skin and makes gloves for Jacob, that his hands, like Esau's, might be "hairy," then takes him to his father and tells him "here is Esau, your eldest born, come to receive your blessing." So he takes Jacob by the hand, and says, "is this my very son Esau?" Yes, they tell him, and as Jacob kneels and asks for the blessing, the old man says, "the hands are Esau's, but the voice is Jacob's," and then administers his last blessing to the boy, to be handed down to his children and grandchildren forever. As Esau comes back and finds what has been going on, and that Jacob has received the dying blessing, he pleads, oh, so piteously, it is enough to melt anyone's heart to read it. "O my father, hast thou not reserved yet one little blessing for me?" and cries aloud, that he, too, may have a share, if ever so small, but the father says Jacob has the blessing, and he shall be blest in his generation, through all time. So Esau, poor man, having been so cruelly duped and lost what property belonged to him, turns away full of sorrow and sadness of utter despair, while his mother is happy at accomplishing, through deceit and barefaced lies, her much desired wishes, Esau was a hairy man, and not liked by his mother, while Jacob, the younger, was her pet.

After Esau's failure of procuring the blessing, he was an outcast, took to the woods, hunted and fed on locusts and wild honey, and become a wild man, companion for the beasts of the forests, while Jacob prospered and became the father of a great nation.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, Mr. Dwight Rathbone, from his home in Ceylon, O., May 27, in the 79th year of his age. He was all his life in the extreme front of reform. Hudson Tuttle was called to officiate at the funeral, which was held May 29. * * *

Mrs. Nancy Temple, of Soule, Mich., passed to the higher life from the home of her son, who lived at Traverse City, where she had gone to visit. She was there only one day when her spirit left for the better life. The son and family returned with her remains to her home in Lowell, where she had many friends. The flowers that the friends furnished were very fine. The services, held at Lawyer Nash's residence, were largely attended. Services by Mrs. J. H. Dunham, of Ionia. COR.

Passed to the higher life, June 1, Charles D. Hawes, aged 78 years. Born in England, he came to America in 1850. He enlisted in the Civil War in 1863, and served until the close. He had been a consistent Spiritualist for the last ten or twelve years. He was a friend to all, and respected by all who knew him. E. H. BEEBE.

Passed to spirit life, May 11, in Milwaukee, Wis., Augusta Brauer, aged 51 years and 8 months. Miss Brauer had been a Spiritualist for many years, sensitive to a marked degree, she not only felt the presence of many in spirit life, but also of the thoughts and influences of people in this life. The funeral was held at Ritter's undertaking parlors, and was largely attended. The writer offered the consolation of Spiritualism at the funeral. G. H. BROOKS.

Alexander F. Buchanan passed to spirit life, May 24, at his new residence (occupied only three weeks), overlooking the beautiful Hudson, the Highlands and Dunderberg mountain, at Peekskill, N. Y., aged 74. His life was fraught with vicissitudes, but crowned with success, material and spiritual. Funeral on the 27th of May, Mrs. Helen T. Brigham presiding, a valuable exponent of Modern Spiritualism on such occasions. He was a constant subscriber to the four leading spiritual papers, and a liberal purchaser of spiritual literature. To the widow of 72 years and grand-daughter, Lillie, residing in the mansion, also the four sons and three daughters, some living remote, all present, Mrs. Brigham gave rational consolation.

TITUS MERRITT.

On the 5th inst., the remains of Mrs. Emma E. Alden, wife of Melvin R. Alden, of Grand Rapids, Mich., were borne to the tomb. The services, by George B. Holmes, were held before an audience of unbelievers in the spiritual philosophy, yet the impression made was favorable to our cause.

Mrs. Alden was endeared to others by many good qualities. Hers was a model home, so far as her motherly and wifely love could make it such. The father and two little boys are left in the now saddened home without her. Yet not wholly so, for Mr. Alden knows that the dead still live and may return. A brother and a sister of Mrs. Alden mourn with them. H.

Mrs. Malinda Jane Gray, of this city, a Spiritualist through many years, has passed into the greater life beyond. The funeral services were on June 7, the address being given by George B. Holmes and a poem, original and appropriate, was read by Mrs. John Lindsay. The remains were then sadly conveyed to Crawfordsville, Ind., for interment.

Mrs. Gray, who was justly much esteemed, possessed strength of character softened by good will, as seen in the patient daily masterly of her life. This, with the memory of her constant loving care, is the rich legacy she leaves her children. These, Mr. Frank Gray, of Iowa, and Mr. Ellis Gray, connected with the management of Powers Opera House in this city, and Mrs. Fannie Parrish, who seems most bereaved, yet remain. H.

A TRUE HEALER

He Brings Health and Strength to Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

SCIENCE TRIUMPHS OVER DISEASE.

DR. PEEBLES, noted the world over as a physician and scientist, is performing some of the most remarkable cures the world has ever seen. His fame has become world-wide on account of these marvelous cures. He has patients in every state in the Union and in many foreign lands who stand ready to testify to the wonderful cures he has made of cases that had been treated by many of the most eminent physicians without success. Many of the Doctor's patients are those who had traveled all over the world, visiting all the great health resorts and sanitariums in a Futile Search for Health and strength. They returned home in despair; thinking there was no hope for them, when they were persuaded to write to Dr. Peebles for a diagnosis. This was so clear and complete, showing a thorough understanding of the case that it inspired enough hope to induce them to try, as a last resort, a course of his treatment. Many such cases show wonderful improvement from the start. A very few months is sufficient in almost all cases to complete a perfect cure. Mrs. L. A. Humbel, of Long Pine, Neb., who was given up with dropsy and kidney disease by the best physicians in the country says: "I am very grateful for what you have done for me, as I am in better health than I have been for five years. I have gained fifteen pounds, and I am getting stronger every day. Last month I visited my aged mother in Iowa. She was greatly rejoiced for she never expected to see me alive again. For five years I travelled and doctored with the best physicians, finally gave up in despair, and went home to my sister, as I thought to die. I can never express how thankful I am for what you have done for me."

Remember that Dr. Peebles does not cure by Christian Science, Mesmerism, or any other "ism," but employs mild but potent remedies in connection with his wonderful Psychic Treatment. These Psychic Treatments, say his patients, "seem as a breath of higher life." If you do not fully understand the Psychic Science and these Psychic Treatments which are such a wonderful aid in the treatment of chronic and obscure cases, the Doctor will send you his essay, "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease," which will explain to you fully Psychic Diagnosing and Psychic Treatment with other valuable information for the sick. There is no one so capable of writing on this subject as Dr. Peebles, for he has investigated it for over a half century, and is a recognized authority on the various occult sciences in Europe as well as in this country.

All of Dr. Peebles' diagnosing is done by the aid of his psychic gifts. He can read the diseased conditions of the body as accurately as if each organ and tissue were open to his view. Out of many thousands of cases he has diagnosed during the past few years, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of each thousand are willing to testify to the marvelous accuracy of the diagnosis. Do you know your exact condition? Have you suffered for years without getting permanent help? Did the physician who treated you fully understand your case? Why will you be experimented upon by those who do not really understand your case when Dr. Peebles can diagnose your case perfectly and thus administer treatment upon a scientific basis? Why will you take patent medicines which are prepared for a "text-book" case, and which at best give only Temporary Relief, when you can secure treatment from this EMINENT HEALER that is Especially Prescribed and Suited to your case, at a very little more cost? These are the questions that interest all those suffering from chronic and obscure troubles. Think them over carefully. If you are sike and discouraged don't delay one moment in writing the Doctor for a diagnosis of your case. There is nothing of more importance to you than the condition of your health. It will cost you nothing to learn this. The Doctor will send FREE OF COST a complete diagnosis of your case and also his essay "The Psychic Science in the Cure of Disease" and valuable literature on chronic diseases and testimonials from some of his cured patients, showing the long list of so-called incurable cases which he has cured. No disease is really incurable if perfectly understood. Every effect or diseased condition has its cause and if these are understood they can in almost every case be removed. When this is done permanent recovery is the result. DO NOT DESPAIR if you have failed to get permanent help, but write at once. Remember that DR. PEEBLES HAS CURED HUNDREDS WHERE ALL OTHERS HAD FAILED. Write him an honest letter, giving full name, age, sex and leading symptom in your own handwriting and he will give you a complete and full diagnosis and will also send the literature as mentioned above. Write today.

TWO IN ONE.

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books complete at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

Is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

ASTRAL WORSHIP.

By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at [illegible]; but that all priests do not."—James Parton

MAN —IN THE—

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF

Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind.

From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buchner.

DEATH DEFEATED;

Or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young.

In taking up this last book of the prolific author and even carelessly scanning its beautifully printed pages, one is surprised at the wealth of illustration that has been gathered in support of the writer's views. It is the best commentary on a book to have at its source a life consonant with its theories. Dr. Peebles may not defeat death by remaining in the physical body forever, but at fourscore years, when with most men the physical and mental powers show a marked decline, he is even more vigorous than he was at fifty, active, with wide plans for the future, and contemplating soon to undertake a lecturing tour around the world.

To achieve health and long life and defeat death, the author has no cut and dried rules, but we gather here and there the method he advocates. If it does not give physical immortality, it is a good code to live by, and will produce spiritual perfection thus preparing for spiritual immortality.

For physical health he says:

Breathe deeply; breathe pure air by day and by night. Be in the light and sunshine as much as possible. Be in bed by nine o'clock in winter time and by eight o'clock in summer time. Rest a while each day. Dress loosely. Suspend garments from the shoulders. Wear a light hat, easy shoes. Keep the feet warm and dry. Sit erect. Alcoholic drinks, tobacco, tea, coffee, morphine, all artificial stimulants and narcotics are to be shunned. Avoid sausage, mince pie, hard cheese, spicy gravies, animal fats, fried food, pickles. Never eat while excited, angry or overheated. Eat slowly. Never retire hungry. The food most recommended is fruit, nuts, grains and vegetables.

Then comes recommendations of spiritual growth even more essential for with them men have lived on all kinds of food, and gained spiritual understanding, but without them the most correct diet is of no avail. Purity, continence, reservation of vital force, charity to all, control of the passions and appetites, make earth a heaven here and now. Gossip and slander not, religiously avoid all occasions for laziness. Have some purpose in view, worry not, cultivate self-discipline, honor yourself, shun shallow, frivolous society.

These are all good rules, a contented mind, a life regulated by the laws of physical and spiritual being, promote health and happiness.

Perhaps the most transparent line of reasoning made in the book is in the preface. The author begins with the question: You are well to-day, reader, are you? Yes.

Not an ache or a pain? Not one.

Your health is perfect? It certainly is so far as I can judge.

Then were you to keep your health up to this present high standard, your body would not die, would it? I do not see why it should.

Neither do I.

Think, consider again. Your body is now constituted of a certain number of atoms, a certain number of molecules and cells, a certain number of bones, muscles, nerves, organs, functions; a certain quantity of acids, alkali, lime, phosphorus, silica and many chemical constituents; and you are in perfect health? I am.

Now, then, supposing that these organs, elements and constituents were to remain in the same ratio of quality and quantity in your organism for years and ages, changing only for the better, if changing at all, you would not die, would you? I do not see why I should.

Neither do I.

The trend of this conversation is shown in the personal application as follows:

"Having passed far beyond the seventies, onto the very verge of the eighties, and yet hale and vigorous, why should I not live a century? Why die at all, as my forefathers did? Why not live in this body immortal on earth? Who will say that by the exercise of will power, and a proper balance of acids, alkalies, atoms, elements and the finer forces, with harmonious environment I shall not continue this existence and still on, until my physical body is so refined and etherealized as to become invisible to mortal eyes—dematerializing and materializing at will?"

And again he says at almost the conclusion of the work:

"The five steps to immortality upon earth are these: 1. A healthy ancestry and right conception. 2. Born rightly in the right months of the year. 3. Educated rightly in the physical, mental and spiritual laws of life. 4. Eating, drinking, toiling and sleeping rightly. 5. Thinking rightly, willing rightly, and doing rightly in the way of supplies for body building. And further, thinking and willing rightly, actualized in manifestation, implies an equal balance of the acids and the alkalies of the secretions and excretions, of the chemical disintegrating forces and of the higher, finer vitalizing up-building forces. Mortality, then, becomes an event, which when reduced to the last analysis, is simply a matter of knowledge or ignorance, folly or wisdom."

This is a beautiful fancy, but the order of nature forbids its realization. In man is the full flush and maturity of his strength there is a perfect balance between the forces of renovation and decay. If this balance could be preserved the being would be immortal. The decadence of age is the weakening of the energies, the increasing of the forces of decay. —death is their mastery. Every organic being has a limited duration—longer under favorable circumstances, shorter under unfavorable, but never under the most favorable greatly exceeding the limit. The purest air, water and food do not prolong the appointed time of the animal's life beyond a narrow margin.

The age of man in olden times was held to be three score years and ten, it often reaches four score, once in hundreds of thousands a full century, but the later years are those of decadence, the strength failing, and the waning physical powers, eclipsing mentality.

In the physical matter the balance cannot be maintained. However wisely and perfectly life may be ordered, there can be no "etherealization" of the matter used in construction of the body, which must remain distinct from spirit substance.

We can understand why this doctrine of physical immortality would be pleasing to a materialist; to one who sees nothing beyond the grave, but we can not see how a Spiritualist can return to it. Spiritualism teaches that the individual is born into this world for the purpose of the evolution of a spiritual being. It is not for man to live forever here. That would defeat the plan of his progression. His life here is that he may die and thus enter a new and higher sphere of activity. To plan how to prolong life beyond its allotted time, to attempt the scheme of physical immortality, would be like the caterpillar desiring to remain continuously feeding on the acrid leaves, year after year unchanged. The object of the caterpillar's life is not to remain a loathsome worm, but to evolve a butterfly. So the object of man's mortal existence is not to immeasurably prolong his physical being, but to evolve a spirit, which will go forward into another sphere of activity. To the Spiritualist death has no terror, and after the duties of life have been completed, he welcomes it as the messenger who opens the door to immortality.

What, then, is gained by this discussion of the ways and means of defeating death? A great deal is gained. earth life is the first sphere of spirit existence; it is or should be the beginning of heaven. While we live in it, we should be happy, and we cannot be if diseased and the victims of unrighteous living. We must understand and obey the laws of our being, and by so doing we prolong our sojourn in this life to the limit.

Life should be made worth the living, with the assurance that the best preparation for the future is a well prepared present.

If Dr. Peebles has not quite demonstrated that man can live forever in the flesh, his book is one that tends to the right interpretation of life, and teems with valuable lessons.

Whether we live here one year or a century, while we live our high heritage is health and happiness. If we fail it is because of our ignorance, and he who instructs us into the right methods of living, thus enabling us to come into our birthright, and enjoy this first sphere as the heaven it is capable of being, is our benefactor and should receive highest praise.

In one of the concluding pages he says:

"It is clear and evident from the previous pages, that the good, the great, and the long-lived have, with few exceptions, attained to old age by avoiding animal flesh, and by obedience to physical, mental, and moral law—that is to say, by right living, by good habits, by persevering industry and sturdy energy of character. The wicked and the lazy do not live out half their days."

If we desire to prolong life, and understand the conditions essential to so doing, no book will be more serviceable than "Death Defeated." We shall not acquire the secret of living forever; you will not probably live in the earthly sphere many years longer, but while you do live you will be happier, and fulfill your duties and obligations more completely and satisfactorily. Death will not be defeated until you die; for its vanquishing is the severance of the spirit from its physical garb. While we live in mortal garb, we desire to enjoy the fullest measure of that life, which we can only do by harmoniously responding to the laws and conditions of our united and blended physical and spiritual being. Yet however perfect this life may be, we feel that it is only a stepping stone to a higher, and our aspirations constantly tend to its attainment. As the child longs for maturity, at maturity it feels that this life does not answer the needs of the spirit, and demands freedom from the retardation and limitations of earth.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

THE ANSWER.

Beyond the skies, in heaven's immensity,
Dwells there a ruler o'er this mundane sphere,
An all-potential king of earth and sea,
Who looks unmoved on man's injustice here
And mortals' bitter tears?

Did our Lord form the earth and give to man
The right to rule, to inflict weal or woe
On helpless brute or human; does he, then,
On creatures he has made to dwell below
Command it so?

"No," say the winds that blow o'er mead and fell.
"No," say the flowers that hide in glade and glen.
"Never," the trees affirm where sweet birds dwell.
"God never did intend that human reign Should cause a creature pain."

'Tis the discordant principle of life,
The sin-inspired atom of this sphere,
That nurtured in the mind creates the strife,
And makes the strong to rule; the weak to fear
And sorrow everywhere.

But life is short; cycles of ages ebb,
And oceans swell with tyrants that are lost.
Far, far above this sea of turgid dead
Dwell the once sufferers of the human host
Forever to rejoice.

THOUGHTS

On Home Circles, Books, Libraries, N. S. A., Etc.

The home circle in the Shaker families, was the beginning of Modern Spiritualism, about ten years before the raps in the Fox family in Rochester, N. Y., in 1848. (Bible Spiritualism commenced when God talked with Adam and Eve.) In 1843 I was requested by a patient to mesmerize her because she was "so nervous."

I had never heard of Mesmer, but I studied it up and became a successful magnetizer, with Rev La Roy Sunderland and several Universalists and Unitarian ministers.

My subjects became clairvoyant and clairaudient, and talked with "dead" neighbors. A lady said, "this reminds me of Swedenborg." I never had heard of him. I read his books and became a new churchman. In a few years I had met the Fox Family, A. J. Davis, Judge Edmonds, Charles Partridge (Partridge & Brittan), Prof. Mapes and his pupil Emma Hardinge, Dr. Comstock, Dr. Foster, Prof. Hare, Gov. Talmadge, John Middleton, the Quaker, and many other brave and intelligent pioneers, too many to mention here.

The home circle was our fort then, as it should be now, and commercialism and fraud would cease. The home circle is the Jacob's ladder between the two worlds. Gen. 28:12. It is a sacred place, more so than a church—no one should enter it without a pure mind, clothing and behavior. A few minutes of soft music, then a few minutes of silent prayer (the Lord's prayer), is a good preparation for the reception of good spirits. Otherwise evil spirits may be attracted, and they seek every opportunity to communicate. Cause and effect is an infallible law. If we make good conditions, we secure good results—bad conditions, bad results. It is an important matter, worthy of the study of every spirit in the flesh.

God is spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in spirit and truth. The spirit of truth is now in the air in all the world and no one can stop its progress.—all things are in commotion—nothing at rest—old things and thoughts are passing away—all things are becoming new. Old creeds, dogmas, governments, must reform or die. Universal inspiration is a natural law in development and progress. The Bible says: "And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for they shall all know me from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more. Thus saith the Lord which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinance of the moon and the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves therof roar; the Lord of hosts is his name."—Jeremiah 31:34 and 35.

Old institutions are now like King Belshazzar, when he saw the spirit hand, writing on the wall, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin." "Thou are weighed in the balance and found wanting."—Dan. v:25.

The king died—all institutions must pass away and give place to the new, of higher development and progress. Those who work on this line co-operate with God by natural law, as Brother Jesus said that it is more blessed to give than to receive—exalted spirits report that they derive their happiness by helping others—that selfishness is the only sin recognized in spirit life. Dr. Franklin reported that his work was to save sinners, and would continue until the last sinner was saved.

Every one interested in the science of life and death should have a reliable book, pamphlet or paper on the subject. A very few people know anything of the life they are destined to live in the spirit world, which is the cause of much unhappiness there. If the money wasted on funerals could be used for reliable literature on spirit life it would be well spent.

An enterprising publisher can aid the good work and benefit himself by supplying traveling libraries of say 25 to 50 books in a strong book case with shelves and a lid to open for a desk to write upon, to loan to responsible parties for compensation, or for sale cheap on easy terms, for single books, or the whole library, payable weekly, or monthly, or a discount for all cash. So that any one, or family, boy or girl, can have a library. The state of New Jersey is now supplying all responsible applicants with traveling libraries of fifty volumes free, to be exchanged monthly for new books, which would give the use of 600 books in twelve months.

The New Church, Unitarian and other societies give books to applicants free. I hope to see the day when all hungry people for spiritual food can be supplied because as Brother Jesus said, we do not live by bread alone. All who aid in this good work will receive spiritual food.

After the library will come spiritual social meetings, readings and volunteer lectures. The New Church Society appoints capable readers where there are no ministers.

Thus permanent humanitarian, harmonious societies would spring up in all directions, become incorporated, build plain, commodious meeting-houses for Sunday services, kindergartens, lyceums and public libraries. Then report to the N. S. A. with voluntary contributions. The N. S. A. has come to stay. It is founded on the Rock of Ages with its able president, competent secretary and honest treasurer. It has its national and international work, which requires money. It should have a competent business general agent to relieve its officers of details and solicit financial aid from rich men and women anxious to do good with their money and other property that they cannot take with them to spirit life where all must go sooner or later, to give an account of their earth life. Much more can be said from long experience, but I forbear and will close with a recipe:

Self-abnegation.
Love.
Sympathy.
Equal parts. Dose, a table-spoonful, the first thing in the morning; at high noon and the last thing at night.

It is a mental cure and sovereign remedy for all the ills of life.

The effect is sure in all cases to produce perfect harmony of spirit, mind and body, and secure health, wealth and happiness in due time. It will abolish war and crime and relieve the church and state of responsibilities and the people of nine-tenths of their taxes, and secure liberty and justice, and food, clothing and shelter for the poor, and create peace on earth and good will to men and women. The heaven on earth that Brother Jesus prayed for in the Lord's Prayer. Let us co-operate with him. "As a man thinketh, so is he." Heaven and hell are mental conditions, death only a change to a higher life with our friends gone before, who communicate with friends on earth, when conditions are favorable, as they must be in all cases to accomplish anything.

EXCELLENT TESTS.

Help This Medium to Take Care of Her Blind Sister.

Mr. Fred G. Ware in Question Department of The Progressive Thinker of May 26, related an instance of a spirit communicating through a medium in California a few moments after he had left his material form in Memphis, Tenn., and as it seemed wonderful, Mr. Ware asks if others have had similar experiences. I have had many, but will only briefly write of the two latest.

One year ago I had la grippe, and while having a restless night, suddenly heard loud raps, then a voice saying, "Mrs. Chamberlain, I have taken the liberty to bring my brother here that I may prove to him that spirits can return and communicate with their earth friends, for he could not believe it possible, while he remained in his mortal form. He passed to spirit life yesterday at 2 p. m. Had an operation for appendicitis and awakened in our spirit home. Will you kindly write some one who you will inform my wife of our coming to you at this time?"

Early in the morning I had pencil and paper brought to my bed, and wrote a friend living on the same street with the wife of the spirit who talked to me, what had been told me, and my friend without delay took my letter to the wife and it made her happy to receive such proof of spirit return. Her husband had proved his identity a few months before, while I was in California, and said to her one day when communicating, "Don't feel anxious about Brother John seeking evidence of these truths, for he will have it soon, and in a way little expected, but I am not permitted to reveal the method, but you will remember what I am now telling you, when the truth is proven to him."

When my letter was read to her she said at once, "That is what my husband meant, and as soon as his brother's spirit left the form, he took him to the medium through whom he had been able to give me such hope and comfort."

This gentleman passed to spirit life in Southern California at 2 p. m. and came to me that night between 12 and 1. I don't feel at liberty to make public the names, but should any one doubt this, I can give them proof beyond cavil.

The last part of January, I dreamed one night (as I supposed) of seeing Miss May Merritt, of Los Angeles, Cal. She said she had been in spirit life a few days, and was anxious to talk with her mother; wished I would write her. The next night she came as soon as I retired and seemed very happy, but was very sorry her mother grieved so much for her, and asked me to tell her how happy she was in her new home; but not being in correspondence with any of the family, I wrote my friend, Mrs. Havens, then in Los Angeles, and asked if Miss Merritt had passed to spirit life, and related the above. She responded Feb. 12, and I quote the following:

"It is true about May Merritt. She passed to higher life the 22d day of January, I think. I have written her mother and will enclose your letter, feeling sure it will be a great comfort and blessing to have such evidence that her loved one is not dead, but lives and loves her still."

I think with Mr. Tuttle that such facts should be accumulated and given to the world.

In closing, permit me to ask the friends to help me if they can, to care for my blind sister, by writing a letter to some spirit friends. Send with one dollar and I will endeavor to obtain a reply.

SPIRITUAL ASPIRATION.

I want my spirit raiment
Without a blemish seen,
And all my life more perfect,
More blooming, fresh and green.
Adorned with heaven's graces,
And filled with fragrance rare,
Would run my race with patience,
With loving trust and care.

I would not be a laggard,
Nor shirk the lightest task;
But up and ever onward,
Devoid of doubt or mask—
With truth my only motto,
And love my gilding star,
Until I reach those portals,
Beyond the "gates ajar."

WHAT IS RELIGION?

Review of a Reviewer's Critical Analysis.

The Critical Analysis in No. 543, is, from my standpoint, an almost perfect example of inconsistency; while the article that is harshly reviewed, written by H. W. B. Myrick in 537, does not appear to be in any essential point a challenge to criticism, pro or con, either from orthodoxy or heterodoxy, pessimist or optimist.

I do not deny that Mr. Myrick's essay completely coincides with my own views; but it is not for this that my criticism is directed toward Mr. Chaapel. Spiritualism is amenable to reason; but "Critical Analysis," with accurate grammar and well constructed phraseology, stands below the epithet of "childish," in its innocence of the faintest ray of reason. Spiritualism does not reject the truth because it happens to find samples of it in the Bible. The Apostle James says: "Pure religion and undefiled is to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Another definition is: "To do good and to be good is the religion of humanity." Mr. Myrick says: "Now, I may say that I have a philosophy of right living based on my conception of this present existence and the relation to another life beyond the grave. Rightly interpreted and understood that is exactly what religion is."

Mr. Chaapel will probably agree that custom establishes the right use of language and the meaning of words. Religion means nothing more, nothing less, than the healthy, legitimate exercise of the natural, normal, moral faculties of man. Superstition is the exercise of the moral faculties without the guidance of reason. We know that superstition dominates the popular churches but we do not know that the churches have a monopoly of religion. I will admit that "superstition has held the reins in the mental world, and is responsible for most of the fallacies in the cob-webbed mind of humanity," but I will not admit that superstition "is one of many of her treacherous children." It was not religion that prompted Constantine the Great to murder his own mother, and repudiate his birthright of paganism. It was not religion that made Pope Gregory burn the true history of religion. It was not religion that prompted the massacre of St. Bartholomew, burned Bruno and Servetus, and persecuted Salem witchcraft. It was superstition, converged in a succession of horrors that were magnified and intensified by the lurid inspirations of ambition and avarice.

Ambition caused such men as Moses, Joshua, David, Caesar, Alexander, and Bonaparte to murder men by the million, for their own aggrandizement and not for anything wrong with the men. And it is altogether beneath the mental status of Mr. Chaapel to say that religion had anything to do with it all. Avarice on the part of the leaders, and superstition on the part of the underlings, has caused priestcraft in all ages, to persecute with ostracism and inquisitorial horrors those who were bold enough or honest enough to stand up for truth. And so far as the church, the priest, and the inquisition were concerned, religion was not a factor in the drama.

It cannot be said with truth that the churches of to-day are destitute of religion; but there is a double element in their midst that over-rides and circumscribes the beauties of true religion; and it is avarice on the part of the leaders and superstition on the part of the underlings. And it is a doubtful commentary on the perspicacity of any one that he can not discern the difference between the sneering ostracism, persecuting spirit of the churches, and the exemplification of a good and true and beautiful religion. Mr. Chaapel says: "Religion is the father, the mother, of tyranny." Religion is hopeful, trustful, deferential, kind and just, and as far from tyranny as right is from wrong. It is simply a muddle to say that these cardinal principles are not dependent on religion for their true unfoldment, for there is no religion besides their cardinal principles of faith, hope, love, reverence and truth. To deny any of these principles is to evince a want of knowledge of the human constitution, and is not amenable to argument. To forever harp on this effete hobby of the rationalist who has simply gone to the opposite extreme from the orthodox churches, is too suggestive of prejudice to require much argument. Study yourself, and when you have learned your lesson well, you will find that religion is really a part, and a large part of your nature; and that superstition, bigotry, prejudice, avarice and crime are simply different phases of perverted nature.

SPIRITUAL CULTURE.

It Comprises the Culture of the Entire Being.

Physical culture has become a science. The world is amply supplied with knowledge on this theme. We have an endless array of methods by which the physical body may be perfected.

Mental culture has also received marked attention of late, especially in its objective aspect. But how does psychic culture fare? The mighty powers of the soul are yet lying dormant in millions of human beings. The psychic flame burns very low in the souls of the countless throngs, while but very few have permitted this flame to be fanned into an active blaze.

To cultivate the powers of the body is good; to cultivate the powers of the mind is better; to cultivate the powers of the soul is still better; but to cultivate all the powers of man's physical, mental and psychic nature in one harmonious unity, is the very best of all. This is spiritual culture.

Concerning the cultivation and use of man's temporal nature we have knowledge unlimited; concerning the cultivation and use of his eternal nature we are still sadly in the dark, but the dawn of the spiritual day is at hand. Vast bodies of illuminated souls in the flesh and out of the flesh are showing to the world the rose-strewn pathway leading to the exalted realms of the spiritual life.

By the spiritual life we mean the whole life. A person lives a spiritual life when he exercises all the functions of his entire being—physical, mental and psychic.

A person who lives only in the physical, and who labors solely to provide for the necessities of physical existence, lives but a small portion of the whole life. The greater part of his life is wasted upon the barren deserts of neglect.

The person who lives both in the physical and the mental does better, but as he neglects the psychic, his life is still but a partial one. It is not a spiritual life. The person who lives to cultivate all the powers of his physical, mental and psychic natures, and labors to supply the needs of all these faculties—he, and he alone, lives a spiritual life, the whole life within him.

A spiritual life is a complete life when all the faculties are active on their respective planes.

Progress cannot be attained unless one exercises, or tries to exercise every faculty, function or power in one's being.

Progress is the result of effort extended beyond our present capabilities.

An absolute spiritual life is existence wherein there are no dormant faculties. This state we shall never reach as it would imply a standstill. This we do not desire; nor is there any evidence of such a state. It is contrary to nature. An absolute spiritual life is non-existent.

A progressive spiritual life is existence wherein the individual is continually placing in activity powers that were previously dormant. These new functions need not all arise upon the psychic planes. There are powers in our physical bodies that we have not yet placed in activity. There are still more of these in the mind. And as for the soul, most of us have not developed to any extent the mighty powers in its grasp. Every new faculty that is brought into use is an indication of progress, whether this faculty be on the lower planes or on the higher ones.

True spiritual culture implies that our efforts towards advancement are distributed over all our planes, equally, beginning with the lowest—the physical. Every effort must begin at the lowest point and pass to the highest, because the ego, the I Am who rules over all these functions, dwells at the highest point. The lower must be drawn up to the higher, not separated from it.

The fundamental principle involved in spiritual culture is Right Thinking. Wrong thinking is the cause of all the so-called evils in the world; therefore right thinking is the remedy for all ills and the promoter of all blessings. "As a man thinketh, so is he."

Right thinking means to exercise our mental forces along lines that lie parallel with true natural action. Right thinking is natural thinking—thinking in harmony with nature, that is, thinking the truth. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Whenever we learn a truth and persist in thinking that truth, we shall be freed from all the evils which the corresponding falsehood produced. Every pain or evil which we may have was produced by the action of an erring or false thought. "As ye sow, so shall ye reap." By knowing the corresponding truth to this false thought, and thinking that truth, that is putting it into action, the corresponding good shall be the result. This law holds good in every department of human action. Those who doubt its efficiency should suspend judgment until they have given this system of thought a fair and thorough trial.

Right thinking can be cultivated by holding in our minds, as often as possible, certain fundamental truths. We shall enumerate a few, which are as follows:

1. "I am a spiritual being."

This means that I am a being composed of many principles, the lower ones being temporal and the higher ones being eternal; that the higher nature is master over the lower; and that my whole being has a spiritual origin, a spiritual nature and a spiritual destiny.

The materialist thinks, "I am a physical body." His all in all is physical; he does not rise above this. He may be moral, and follow the recognized laws of ethics, still he can not be spiritual as long as he thinks that he is a physical body. As a man thinketh so is he. His life is incomplete; the lower self is master; the higher self is dormant; the result is that sin, suffering, disease, misery and trouble haunts the chamber of nearly every human being. The materialistic thought is the prevailing one.

The churches give no evidence of a higher nature, therefore all their adherents continue to think that they are physical bodies. A few may recognize the present reality of the spiritual nature; but how many Christians have as yet declared with all the power of their minds, "I am a soul?" Very few, if any.

The Spiritualists believe that we are now souls or spirits, just as much as we ever will be. They believe it, or know it; but how many have begun to "think it?" Not very many. The majority of the Spiritualists as yet permit their consciousness to act solely on the physical plane. Give them physical phenomena, and you win their profound attention; tell them to look within for the cause of these mighty demonstrations, and they comprehend you not. The external alone touches their intellect. Their day to comprehend the internal has not yet come; but it ought to come quickly, and quickly it shall come, if the spiritual teachers would persist in demanding right thinking among their pupils.

The person who thinks that he is a spiritual being, and thinks thus with all the power of his mind, creates a series of powerful thoughts conveying the idea of spirituality. This idea will eventually become the ruling one in his mind. His entire being will be governed solely by the spiritual thoughts and the spiritually inclined mental tendencies. The tendency of every effort will be to reach out into the vast realms of the unknown. The spiritual is unlimited; to think only spiritual thoughts will draw the intellect into the realms of limitlessness; and by so doing transcend the circumscribed spheres of the physical. The troubles, weaknesses and imperfections of the physical no longer continue to master him; but he in turn begins to master them, thereby annihilating their existence.

By thinking that you are a spiritual being, and thinking thus with intense force, your consciousness will ere long become so completely absorbed by the mind of the soul that you will consciously know and actually feel that you are a spirit, living in a fleshy tabernacle. After having reached this precious goal, the temporal forces become the servants of your being and the eternal forces become the masters.

He whose being is ruled by eternal forces need never fear pain, trouble or sorrow. These evils cannot live in the atmosphere of eternal powers.

All of us can gradually approach this most excellent state by training ourselves in the art of right thinking. The first step in this achievement is to think persistently and uninterruptedly this eternal truth, I Am a Spiritual Being.

IN CHERRY TIME.

A robin sang in a cherry tree
Whose boughs were white with fruit to be,
And the bird sang there as merrily
As ever a bird may sing.
Beneath that veil of green and white
He sang of a nest that was hidden quite,
Till the sweet voice seemed in its delight
The gladdest voice of spring.

He sang of a queen whose love he kept,
Of sky-blue eggs where music slept,
Till lullaby through love song crept
In joyous overflow,
As far and wide the sweet notes rang
Sad souls that listened lost some pang,
Glad hearts grew gladder because he sang,
For joy is catching, you know.

In cherry time, when boughs were red
With luscious fruit, bold robin said:
"Come, wife, and taste the sweet feast spread,— There's plenty of fruit to spare."
"'Tis the very thing for our babes," said she,
"'Twill redden their breasts so beautifully,
Our hungry little family
And we have earned a share."

A thoughtless boy and a nice new gun,
A mother that hated to spoil his fun,
And only smiled at the murder done,
Making the deed her own.
A handful of cherries the richer—ah, true!
But the worms that infest will even with you,
The heart of your child be less kindly and true
For the seeds of cruelty sown.

Poor robin fell with a red, red breast;
His dying mate crept back to her nest;
A joyful note that spring possessed
Had grown forever mute.
Ah, surely the souls of robin and wife,
Through gunless lands, beyond man's strife,
Soared straight that day to the tree of life
With its many kinds of fruit.

"God bless my child," a mother said,
Kneeling that night by her son's white bed;
"May virtue crown his sunny head
And naught of sin condemn.
Have mercy on me and mine," she cried
While another's babies starved outside,
Out in the night-rain chilled and died
For lack of mercy to them.

O! for a broader faith to teach
That the golden rule should further reach,
Till past the line of human speech
The sheltering fringe shall fall.
O! for the better time to be,
When human love and sympathy
Shall further look past "mine" and "me,"
And kinder be to all.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWENTY-SEVEN.

There are many who look upon Spiritualists as visionary and impracticable, and there may be those who are so; but here within the celestial world it is not so. Spirits and angels are as practical as possible and as busy as the busiest people of earth can be.

As we said in our last letter, it is not man alone who is translated to this life, but all things by which on earth he is surrounded. Yes, dear friends, all things tend upward together with man; consequently on arriving here he feels very much at home. He may have his faithful dog or horse, together with other pet animals. He may have his house, his garden and his flowers. He may live in a city, village, town or in the country. He may sail on the water or visit forests, mountains, valleys and glens. He may visit different races of men, also planets and constellations of worlds, and oftentimes he can hardly realize that he is not on the material plane of being. All the distinction he finds is, that all things now are spiritual, devoid of gross matter. When we say gross matter we mean just what we say; for friends, this world is really material after all, for spirit here also clothes itself with sublimated matter, and the earthly world is gross matter. The spiritual world is sublimated matter, and there is not any place throughout eternity that is devoid of matter, either in its gross or sublimated form. There is no place throughout eternity that is devoid of spirit. There is no spot throughout eternity that is devoid of soul. Spirit and matter are but the hand-maidens of soul, and soul is God, the living and governing principle within all that exists or has life.

We spoke in our last letter of the various races of men, and how race after race gradually disappeared entirely off the face of the globe; and we tried to show that races did not, after all, amalgamate. We do not say that there may not be a certain amount of amalgamation, but a few exceptions generally prove the rule. The Jews, even to this day, remain a distinct race. The native African, the same. There are many half-breeds, we admit, but as a rule they do not mix and multiply. The Chinese nation remains Chinese, as do all other Mongolians; so do the nations of India, and the American Indian. One nation may subjugate another, but they rarely ever mix to any approachable degree; and it is precisely so in the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Now what we wish to show in this letter is, that it is the same here. Here are all the races and various tribes of men, and the lines are really drawn with more distinctness than on the earth, and the various races abide together by themselves, mingling very little with those not belonging to them; and their cities and towns are usually over and above the corresponding cities and towns of earth. More especially is this true of the spheres nearest earth. For instance, over and above the Chinese empire exists innumerable spiritual stratas, nearly all made up of the native Chinese. So of Africa. So of Egypt. So of India. So of the islands of the sea. So of Europe. So of America, both North and South. Now this is also true of the various cities and towns; more especially of the large cities of the world.

One can readily see that this must necessarily be so. By this we do not mean that Spirits and angels may not and do not go whenever and wherever they please; still, this general law holds good, and the natural law of attraction and adaptability holds nations and tribes together. The Chinese are Chinese still. The Hindoos are Hindoos still. The African is African still, and so on and we are told, by those very far above us in wisdom, that this law holds good throughout eternity. An individual holds his individuality throughout eternity, so do nations and races of men.

Now there is another point that we wish to touch upon, and that is, the pathway of the earth. Sometimes when men talk of spiritual spheres, and thoughts cannot be things, and so forth, else the universe could not hold them, one would suppose that the universe was cramped for room. The mind of man can scarcely conceive of the enormous distance the earth travels every day. Not only does she revolve entirely over everyday but her pathway around the sun every year is almost inconceivable to the mind of man. It is quite appalling to think of the vast distance which lies between the earth and the sun, and more appalling still to think of the awful distance traveled by the earth in the oscillatory and circling pathway around the sun each year, carrying with her all her shining spiritual spheres.

Now the earth herself is but a small nucleus within her shining spheres, and together with her spheres is many, very many thousand times larger than her gross material bulk; and as she travels this enormous pathway, she leaves behind her each year tokens that she has been there. Her very outermost sublimated sphere is partly left behind her each year—all, in fact, that she cannot hold longer by her attractive force; and all these various forms of use and beauty are gradually filling immensity.

But it is now more especially earth's pathway that we wish to speak of. If the reader will follow us we will say that the zodiac is bordered in all directions, millions upon millions of miles each way, by the spiritual emanations thrown off from the earth; and, here again, we find scenes upon scenes of heavenly beauty. These are of such transcendent and surpassing loveliness that they cannot be described to the children of earth.

O friends! Man's idea of heaven is not meaningless. It is at first crude and not well understood, but time remedies that. There are many other things in this connection that we could speak of, such as, that the earth's pathway is never precisely the same, for the sun is traveling also, and carrying her children, the planets, with her. But the earthly mind can scarcely comprehend such stupendous facts, so we will desist. Still, of course, every schoolboy well understands that this is so, yet he does not understand about the spirit spheres and corresponding zones. The spheres are those which the earth carries with her; the zones, that which she leaves behind her in her zodiacal pathway around the sun. Herein we speak only of the earth, saying nothing about the other planets, and when the mind has taken in all this enormous space, it is only that which appertains to one comparatively small planet. This alone is enough to make the mind of man reel; but, after all, the mind that can grasp it has already become too strong to reel.

Of course, in the zodiacal zones there are no children or youths. All things have reached a highly perfected condition—and not a single spirit within those zones. All are angels—perfected wholes—yet the male and female still appear in two forms.

Nothing here, whatever, is in an undeveloped or youthful condition. Not a sin or error of any kind exists—not a mistake is ever made. Every art has reached its very ultimate. No farther progress can be made either in arts or sciences. These may be called God-angels, for truth, love and wisdom have become perfected—that is, so far as an earthly mind can possibly understand. But these perfected souls still have eternity before them—still have countless worlds that they may visit. These souls radiate Wisdom, Love and Truth. The procreating powers of the male and female generate thoughts, which are things, and the generating of earthly children typifies the angelic generating of perfected thoughts. As the earth rolls through these vast zones, the higher angels of the earthly spheres gather and appropriate them, then hand them down to the sphere below them, and so on, the higher always feeding the lower, until at last they strike the very lowest, or earthly spheres. The zodiacal angels scarcely ever visit the earth—sometimes at very rare intervals—then usually in large bands; and it is generally at some epoch or great crisis which the earth is passing through, too great for the spiritual spheres to manage.

I have previously said that I have been within the celestial life somewhat more than twenty years of your earthly time, and during this time I have not discovered any sphere higher than the ones above mentioned; but who can say what eternity has in store. To be sure I have visited the sun and many of the planets and I spoke of angels who had visited the great zone called the milky way; but, personally, I have not visited the milky way. It is something like this: A person on earth may never have visited a far-off foreign land, but he may have seen and conversed with those who had, and that is what I have done. They tell me that the astronomers of earth are right when they say that it is a vast zone of suns and countless worlds; neither have I ever visited one of the so-called fixed stars, which are also suns to other systems of worlds; neither do I yet make my home in the perfected zone just outside of the earth's orbit, but I have visited it as one might visit a splendid city and yet not be able to make his home there. A boy can look at a man and think how wise, large and grand he is; yet the boy is not a man.

And I wish just here to correct an error that exists in the minds of some Spiritualists, and it is this: They suppose that no spirit can ascend beyond the sphere or plane to which they naturally gravitate, but this is a mistake. A spirit may, and does, visit many spheres, both higher and lower than the one wherein he makes his home—the one for which he is best adapted. If spirits could not travel and leave the sphere in which they reside it would be impossible for them to visit earth or any sphere lower than their own.

Oh, no; spirits can ascend and descend as, of course, the law of spirit communion absolutely proves; yet it is true that all angels make their homes in the celestial sphere which corresponds to their wisdom and love. For instance, an angel may be exceedingly wise or gifted in one or more directions and lacking in others and, consequently, must make its home in a sphere not yet perfected in glory. The spirit or angel is yet a pupil, not what might be called a God-angel. The perfected or God-angel is as high as we can, at present, possibly conceive of.

Helena and myself are not yet a God-angel—we are not yet even an arch-angel—we do not yet dwell outside of the earthly spheres, but we have, in traveling, ascended and descended and have rolled about with other planets, within the luminiferous ether, much to our joy and satisfaction. But, of course, dear friends, if we were fitted to dwell in the very highest spheres, we could not be here now controlling a sensitive to write for us to the dear ones who will read this.

Perhaps some of you would like to know to what sphere we do belong. Well, I would like to say that we never have dwelt or belonged to the first or lowest sphere. When I entered the spirit world I at first naturally gravitated to the third sphere. That being about the position I occupied on earth. When I left the body, I was not a low, immoral or degraded man, but somewhat talented in many respects and had also acquired considerable wisdom; still, not enough to take me at first beyond the third sphere, and I am at present dwelling within, what might be considered the fourth degree or sphere; yet, I can visit any sphere I please, as those in other spheres can visit this or any sphere above or below it. If we could not travel, and thereby acquire wisdom, to have thrown aside the body would not count for much.

O, yes, we can earnestly desire the presence of any great mind and telepathy is so well understood here that the angel whom we wish for earnestly will come to us, and this is a great joy and satisfaction. Without it, as one can readily see, progress would be impossible. And here let me say that there are but seven distinct spheres revolving with your earth, your earth making the eighth. But there are very many intermediate spheres, and I would like also to state that Mrs. Mary T. Longley is quite right when she says that there are no children in the first sphere above or around the earth. Children are too pure and innocent to dwell in the first sphere, and those within the first sphere could not and would not teach them any good thing.

In the first sphere there is little else than vice, degradation and impurity; but the higher angels must constantly visit this sphere in order to teach the spirits in prison, or the ignorant, vile and degraded. In this sphere also are found the very lowest forms of animal life—sharks, serpents, alligators, lizards, toads, exceedingly wild beasts of prey, buzzards and many other horrible monsters that are now extinct on the earth; but as one ascends into the next sphere, one finds cats, dogs, horses, singing birds, and all manner of pet animals. Rats and mice are found in the first sphere, together with swine; still, in the second sphere swine are occasionally found, together with negro life. If one would take the trouble to read Mary Ann Carew, it would be seen that good old Ponto, a negro slave, took great delight in gathering about him farm or plantation stock, such as he had been accustomed to in earth life, and he would have been very unhappy in any other condition; and, in fact, old Ponto was too good to gravitate to the first sphere. He might not have been very wise, but he was exceedingly forgiving, devotedly affectionate and good. There are not many Indians in the first sphere. They, also, have too much native wisdom and goodness. In fact, Indians may be found in all the spheres, but in the second sphere they have their ponies and their dogs, and they actually go hunting the buffalo. It is wild sport and joy to them. They are not able, of course, to kill the buffalo, but ponies, dogs and the buffalo all seem to enjoy the sport hugely, together with the Indians. The Indians could not progress or be happy, unless there were correspondences like these in the happy hunting grounds—otherwise the spirit spheres. There comes a time when they get beyond all this, but it is a long time.

You may ask me now, how it is with vicious and degraded mothers who may be in the first sphere? Are they not allowed to be with their children?

A mother so vile and degraded that she is in the first sphere, has become lost to all parental feeling. A mother who is capable of loving and teaching her child does not gravitate to the first sphere. There are not as many women in the first sphere as there are men and youths; but youths do not remain in the first sphere long, for the higher spirits and angels seize upon these budding, growing minds and instill wisdom and good principles within them and they are soon taken out of the first sphere and placed in schools where they can come in contact with nothing but good.

Oh, we have work to do here. None may be idle, not one. And none are. The second sphere is absolutely filled with schools and children. They are met with in all places and everywhere. Yet children and schools are found in all the spheres, even to the seventh, for many exceedingly wise angels, who naturally gravitate to the seventh sphere, draw the children of their love to themselves; yet the children in the sixth and seventh spheres are comparatively few, for not many parents who have little children are wise enough to gravitate to these spheres themselves; still, there are some; but, in the zodiacal zone there are none whatever.

Few spirits remain very long within the first sphere, for they are constantly being snatched as brands from the burning and as constantly being replaced by others who are always arriving from earth; here we find the drunkard, the opium-eater, the libertine, the gross, the exceedingly selfish, the murderer, the rapist, the robber, the seducer, the degraded and vicious youth, the cruel and the heartless; and, oftener than otherwise, the men and women who have been exceedingly rich on earth; especially if their wealth has been obtained at the expense of their brother man, and when it has rendered them selfish, unfeeling and dishonest in all things; the miser, the procuress and the brothel-keeper—these oftener than their victims. Sufferers and victims, from any cause or of any kind, are not often in the first sphere. The unprogressed and lowest tribes of mankind are also in the first sphere.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

SPIRITUALISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

The Rev. H. R. Hawels, in addressing the audience, said he felt in an exceedingly difficult position. He was not an expert in Spiritualism like some of those present, although he was quite willing to call himself a Spiritualist. He could not, indeed, conceive how any Christian could object to call himself a Spiritualist. Merely calling oneself a Spiritualist did not imply that one was obliged to believe everything that was written on the subject.

It was his earnest desire to say something that would be useful to the outside world. He did not believe in trying to make everybody sing the same tune. The more they attempted to get everyone to agree with a cut and dried set of opinions about anything, Spiritualism included, the more likely it was that they would eventually break up into small sects and parties, as had been the case in the Christian Church. If he was asked what his opinions were concerning the prosecution of Bond street clairvoyants, then he would say that he considered such a prosecution an anachronism—they were altogether behind the age. They might as well get the London County Council to prosecute all the doctors who professed to cure diseases which they did not cure.

Now, if they would only prosecute a few clergymen for preaching hell-fire and frightening the poor children into fits and sending timid women into lunatic asylums, there would be some sense in it. Spiritualism was not a question for such prosecutions. They might as well get the County Council or the House of Lords to adjudicate the doctrine of the Trinity. It was not a question for such public tribunals, it was a question for private judgment. Whether people went to mediums and believed what they were told; whether they went to those who practiced psychometry, astrology, clairvoyance, or what not, was a matter for private opinion, not for public prosecutions. The people who approved such prosecutions assumed that common sense would be on the bench, but it was more often common ignorance which was on the bench. For adjudication on such matters a man needed special knowledge, intuition, trained faculties—he wanted what Mr. Balfour called the right "psychological climate." His mind needed to be capable of acting upon certain planes of thought and feeling, which your common judge and jury were utterly incapable of doing. After all, the public were the best judges of the people who cured them or who advised them. If they went to people who didn't cure them, or could not advise them properly, or who turned out on trial to be charlatans, well, they left off going. No one could really protect people who liked to be made fools of. But, anyhow, it was perfectly ridiculous to rake up old-fashioned laws and obsolete acts of Parliament, and treat sensitive, specially-gifted people as vagabonds and rogues who obtained money under false pretenses. Heaven help all the doctors and the parsons and lawyers if people were always to be brought to book for obtaining money without giving an equivalent, or, in other words, under false pretenses!

If this writer had been an adept in Spiritualism, he would have discovered a far simpler method of clearing up the seeming mystery; for two solutions of it would have presented themselves to his mind, and he would have reasoned thus: Jesus Christ may have been a reincarnation of Jesus Christna; or each of these personages may have had precisely the same controls. For we must always bear in mind that Jesus of Nazareth never claimed credit as the originator of the beautiful truths he uttered, or as the author of the singularly effective language in which they were clothed. They were "given to him," he said. He was perfectly conscious of his own mediumship; because being both clairaudient and clairvoyant, he saw and heard the angels by whom he was inspired; and the spotless purity of his life and conversation, and the high-reaching grandeur of his aspirations, supplied the best possible conditions which the higher intelligences could possibly desire from any human being, for the purposes of complete control.

Spiritualism—viewed merely as implying a knowledge of spirit return and the practice of spirit communion—in order to make it a great, beneficent and all-pervading power in the world. Each of us can do something to help forward that great Reformation which will make the next century more momentous by far than the first of the present Era, in the annals of mankind. But every Spiritualist can also do much to retard its accomplishment, if his or her life and conduct does not exemplify his or her conviction that the Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man, the immortality of the spirit, and the responsibility of every one of us, for our individual thoughts, words and deeds, are eternal principles and everlasting verities.

Among the hindrances to the spiritualization of Spiritualism is the abuse of the doctrine of affinities, especially in the United States. This doctrine is fundamentally true, I am fully persuaded. But, as I have been repeatedly assured, persons thus eternally allied to each other, rarely come together on the earth, and, indeed, are rarely living upon it at the same period of time. As a general rule, the one is the spiritual guide or guardian of the other, during his or her terrestrial pilgrimage, and is thus much more helpful to the person so guided and guarded, than if he or she were the earthly companion of his or her charge.

Unhappily for poor humanity, there are always lying and malignant spirits ready to poison the minds of men and women who are uncongenially mated, by whispering to one or the other, "You are not in affinity with your partner for life. Such and such a person is your complementary self." And so disunion creeps in, unholy and criminal inclinations and tendencies are fostered and developed, and the result is open shame, or secret infamy; and the cause of Spiritualism is vitally injured by the scandals which arise.

LIGHT, LONDON, ENG.

A QUESTION AND AN HYPOTHESIS

What causes the disintegration of a dead body?

Of course we do not want to be told that chemical changes occur, that the hydro-carbons are unstable compounds, etc. The question we want light upon from scientific sources, is not—how do bodies disintegrate, but—what is the immediate cause of disintegration? Apparently the immediate cause is not the withdrawal of life; for if the particles were held in combination by the presence of vitality alone, in the absence of vitality they would immediately cease to combine, and the body would at once be dissipated, its atoms uniting with the gases in the air; which sudden dissipation does not usually occur, except in the case of bodies which have been long dead, and which, we believe, do when exposed to the air thus collapse suddenly.

What is that force? Is there reason for supposing that it is identical with what is known as the Psychic Aura?

Some information might possibly be obtained through mediums as to whether the aura which is the means by which physical phenomena and materializations are effected, is also the means by which chemical affinity operates to form and maintain the hydrocarbons of the body. Of course such information, even if obtainable at all, would—to be of value—have to be corroborated by various controls, and even then it would only serve as a working hypothesis, requiring further investigation and verification.

It would, however, be both very interesting and very advantageous if the science of the two states (the discarnate and the incarnate) could be thus correlated. Such correlation, if effected (and it may ultimately be possible to do this) would have wider import than we can at present discern, but even now we can see that it would suggest the solution of some puzzling problems.

For instance, if a dead organism only disintegrates in proportion to the dissipation of the psychic aura which permeated it during life, and if this aura is used for physical manifestation and quasi-physical manifestations, we have a clue to the reason why apparitions are seen in graveyards, and why Stainton Moses was told that certain spirits could communicate with him because he had passed their graves. Also, it would follow that if in any particular case the aura were completely and suddenly withdrawn the body would suffer no corruption, but would simply be rapidly dissipated in a gaseous form. The disappearance of the body would seem to be a contravention of natural laws, whereas it would not really be so at all, it would be in strict conformity with them.

We know of one occurrence of unparalleled importance and far-reaching results in the history of Christendom, in which such a sudden dissipation of a human organism seems to have taken place. The astonished observers remarked that the linen clothes which had enswathed the corpse, and the napkins that had been bound round the head, were seemingly lying as they had placed them, but that they had collapsed, and they "found not the body." He who once had tenanted it, materialized again and again in their presence, giving them such objective physical manifestations as to leave them no room to doubt that it was he himself, but they could form no satisfactory theory as to what had happened to the body they had laid in the grave.

Perhaps the science of this plane correlated to the science of the other may yet solve that problem for us and enable us to understand how, without contravening any of the laws of his Father's universe, but merely by adapting them, as he had many times during his incarnation proved himself competent to do, this Archetypal Man robbed death and the grave of their illusive terrors and revealed to his brethren their true life and destiny.

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

SPIRITUALISM SPIRITUALIZED.

But Spiritualism, spiritualized by the impact of our minds, of the eternal truths that are daily and hourly reaching us from the higher spheres, overthrows all foolish traditions and childish delusions. It admonishes us that each of us is responsible for every thought, word and action of our daily lives, and must bear the consequences of whatsoever evil we may have committed or only meditated; that that evil must be expiated and obliterated by good, either in this life or in that which is to come, our own consciences becoming our judges hereafter, as they were intended to be the guides and directors of our conduct, while we are on earth; and that the remorse we are bound to experience, on account of our shortcomings, is finite in its duration, purifying in its influence, and disciplinary in its effects. We are further taught that there is no place in a boundless universe, created, governed, and sustained by Almighty Love, for a region of eternal torment; and that a fiction so blasphemous and preposterous, could only have originated in the mind of man, at a very rudimentary stage of its development.

Glancing at the structure of the solar systems, which fill the shoreless ocean of Infinitude, our spiritual guides assure us that what science has hitherto designated as atomic cohesion, gravitation, or attraction, is not a physical law, but a spiritual principle; and that sympathy is the power which binds together the unitary atoms of a molecule, which coordinates the constituents of the globe we inhabit, maintains the planets in their respective orbits, and determines the mode and magnitude of the march of the centre of our little system, with its attendant satellites, around some central sun, of the position of which we are completely ignorant.

Spiritualism, when spiritualized, teaches us that each atom of that vast aggregate which we call "mankind," should be drawn towards every other atom, by the power of that same sympathy; and that unity, and not division, harmony and not discord, the love of our species and not the love of ourselves, should be the motive force of all human actions. This was the primordial law, written, as Paul says, "not on stone, but on fleshy tables of the heart." But man, in the exercise of his freedom, chose to disobey this law of universal sympathy, and thus brought himself into discord with Nature and his fellow-creatures; and the consciousness that this is so, suggests to the minds of certain theologians the doctrine of Original Sin, the introduction of which into the world, they endeavor to account for by the childish fable of Eve and the apple.

Spiritualized Spiritualism places in our hands a key which unlocks so many mysteries which have hitherto proved insoluble by the unassisted human mind. I remember one, for example, which greatly perplexed the mind of a Frenchman, Louis Jacolliot by name, who spent some years in the East, and on returning to Europe wrote a book entitled "The Bible in India," with the "Life of Jesus Christna" as its sub-title. In this book he pointed out the many striking coincidences between the lives and doctrines of the Nazarene and those of Christna, who lived 3,000 years before our present era; and as he could not account for these coincidences satisfactorily to his own mind, and as it was an absolute impossibility for the Son of the Hebrew Mary to have any knowledge whatever of the Son of the Hindu virgin, M. Jacolliot solved the difficulty by denying that such a person as Jesus of Nazareth ever existed!

The Pantheism of Modern Science.

By F. E. Titus, Barrister,
Of Toronto, Canada.

"Man the Mirror of the Universe."

By a comparison with man himself we can perhaps best focalize and illustrate this great fact of cosmic unity, coupled with the other equally important and more readily observed fact of the presence within that unity of distinct entities, each carrying on its own evolution in its own way, yet each sharing in the common destiny.

In the human being we have various forms of conscious life, manifested at the same time, all working within and subject to the more fully developed consciousness of the man himself; mineral life with its low degree of consciousness yet carrying on its own activities within the human body; vegetable growth also controlled by its own psychic or soul life or consciousness; the animalculae, the bacilli and the microbes, waging their battles for existence within the larger organism of the human body; and over all the human mind, willing, controlling, directing, the supreme ruler of that universe which is included within the limits of his body. So in the yet larger organism which we speak of as the universe or cosmos. When once the homogeneity of substance, and the unity and universality of force, consciousness and life are apparent, we are led upward to the probability, as a direct and logical sequence of the best scientific research of our day, that here is a larger organism, dominated by a supreme intelligence, a cosmic consciousness; governed by a universal will, in a manner analogous to that by which man governs and provides the conditions for the various inferior forms of life which find their brief day within the environment which he makes for them. As man includes each atom in his body, and as his intelligence and will determine the sphere of activity and conditions under which the atom with its more limited intelligence and powers must work—his habits, which are the special application of the general laws of nature, constituting to a large extent their laws, so the entity which we speak of, either as the universe itself or as God, includes within it every human being, everything manifest and unmanifest. The intelligence of this universal entity fixes the laws of His universe in a manner somewhat analogous to the manner by which through our habits we determine the condition and powers of atomic life within us. There are natural laws, and yet each intelligent being has the power to place himself either in harmony or disharmony with those laws; thus affecting his physical body and every atom thereof. In a similar way the universal intelligence may possibly assume one or other of many relations to still more general principles of absolute existence and by thus determining its relation to higher laws affect all its own methods of operation; in other words make the laws of its own universe. Thus considered, we would have degrees of intelligence and power extending all the way in gradually ascending stages from the atom to the Absolute, each being but one link in the endless chain of existence. The universal Deity so far transcends our powers and fixes the range of our operations that it to us presents the idea of omnipotence. This conception of the omnipotence and omniscience of the Deity is most uplifting; but the truth is made all the more valuable by the knowledge that the omnipotence and omniscience are but relative, and that away beyond this relation of things stands the Absolute Principle, so far beyond us that the eye of the keenest intellect can discern naught of the limit of its capacities, the human mind can have no comprehension of the infinite Be-ness.

The Dual Process of Nature.

Evolution is only a half truth. Within that Eternal Being which is the Cosmos there are continually going on two processes, opposing but not inconsistent. One of these is evolution. Its converse is involution. Involution is the tendency of the noumenal, the subjective—the spiritual, the essence of life and being—to rush outward or downward to the phenomenal, the objective, the material, the form in which it manifests itself. Through involution active powers tend to become latent possibilities. Through it the powers of the universe become wrapped up in the most inert and solid forms of matter. It finds its expression in the gradual densification of matter and a corresponding lessening of the activities of conscious force (spirit).

In the process of the making of our solar system, if we start at a stage when manifestation is about to take place, the Divine Being having assumed the dual aspect of spirit-matter, motion is apparently retarded in that it passes from the active to the passive condition of energy. The consciousness which is wrapped up in the motion becomes less and less active; matter becomes less and less affected by it, until through stage after stage of descending consciousness the final limits of materialization takes place, matter has reached its most inert condition, the effect of the impulsive life within becomes the least noticeable. Yet the higher aspect of this entity has not ceased to be. In the words of Krishna, "Having pervaded this whole universe with a portion of myself, I exist" (Bhagavad Gita). The downrushing tendency of involution is everywhere met by the uprushing stream of evolution. The two great tendencies of things ever serve to preserve the divine equilibrium. The Materialist and the Idealist each alike but give expression to a half-truth. The former has his mental gaze fixed upon the process which unfolds the latent possibilities and transforms them into higher and yet higher forms of activity, and therefore sees in the physical world the source and promise of the higher; the latter, going back of things as they now are, seeks for their cause and finds the manifest proceeding from the unmanifest. The two are but complementary modes of operation of the great reality.

In this involutionary process, as we can readily perceive, down to a certain stage substance would remain homogeneous, force undivided and conscious life unified. The time came, however, when from the one the many should proceed. Innumerable centres of energy were formed in space, force whirling with inconceivable rapidity, gathering around it the primordial substance, each centre having necessarily linked with it the threefold characteristics of consciousness, force and substance. Consciousness and force being the function, they operate upon substance and thus build the structure.

This involutionary process of nature has not been so strongly emphasized by our scientific friends as has the converse fact of evolution. Their attention has been so keenly interested in the one that the other has been by many allowed to pass unnoticed. Yet not entirely. Scientists long since declared the impossibility of a creation out of nothing. Ex nihilo nihil fit. An eternal transformation is alike the dictum of science and the teaching of Theosophic writers. Yet if nothing can be created anew, all these present forms, as well as those which are yet to come must have had an eternal potential existence. This is a logical necessity which impressed itself upon the mind of the scientist and the philosopher, and accordingly we have Prof. Ludwig Buchner declaring that, "All yet future forms, including reasoning beings, potentially or in capacity—must have existed in the primal world-mist out of which the solar system was gradually evolved." The same idea of involutionary process is suggested by David Starr Jordan, President of the Leland Stanford University, in the February, 1898, number of the Popular Science Monthly, when he points out that "the recognized law of biology is that function precedes structure," that "something of mental action came before there was ever an organized brain." The conclusion—so irresistible that it has become a recognized law—forced upon investigators by the study of biology—that science which investigates the phenomena of life, we thus find to be in entire accord with the doctrine of the involutionary process in nature, taught in Theosophic literature. Mentality before an organized brain, in other words, the mind before the body; primal chaotic world-mist, with all its possibilities, before the organized physical globe; involution before evolution so far as the earth at its present stage of manifestation is concerned. And yet in the larger sense the two processes are eternally concurrent, though there is a cyclic law running through it all which gives an alternate period of dominancy first to the one process and then to the other.

The dual process of involution and evolution enters into all growth. As an example let us look at the process of the growth of a plant. This is carried on through a gathering in of all the material of plant growth through leaves and roots from air and earth. It grows. Presently the bud develops, the seeds fill, expand and ripen. From all parts of the organism of the plant its vital forces concentrate the life principle in the seed, so that within these tiny particles all of the potentialities of future plant life are wrapped up. Within the seed lies the future stalk and root and leaves and even the future generation of seeds.

All this has by the process of plant growth been "involved" in the seed. This is Involution. When those seeds, planted, commence to germinate, and a new plant springs forth and develops we have the process of Evolution. Yet we have Evolution as well as Involution going on in the formation of the seed, for all through the process of growth there is the building of more refined and fitter structures, a more complete vitalization thrown into the seed, which in turn gives birth to a more advanced specimen. And the Growth of the plant includes not only the fact of evolution, but this growth is accomplished only through the drawing in and specializing for the use of that distinct organism, of the life forces and material from the great oceans of life and matter. This is involution. The two processes are thus seen linked together, each including and dependent upon the other. They are concurrent. Why is evolution more rapid in vegetable than in mineral—in animal than in vegetable? Is it not because, as the ascent is made in the scale of being, the vegetable lends itself to the involutionary process more rapidly than does the mineral, the animal more readily than the vegetable? Each drinks in, according to its power, the life force and material from the surrounding environment, wraps them up within its form, and by their means its own evolution is made possible.

When involution has reached its utmost limit of materiality the process of evolution begins to show its power. Potential energy is transformed into kinetic. The swing of the pendulum of eternity carries life up the ascending arc of being. Evolution is the unfolding of powers, capacities, qualities. All the infinite possibilities of the universe are wrapped up in each molecule and atom of matter, even as all the possibilities of the plant are wrapped up in each seed. Not only is the atom a world in embryo, but its very motion is a miniature duplicate of the motion of the universe.

Nikola Tesla (page 149 of his Inventions, etc.) describing the process of producing magnetism, says: "An infinitesimal world, with the molecules and their atoms spinning and moving in orbits, in much the same manner as celestial bodies, carrying with them and probably spinning with them, ether, seems to my mind the most probable view. The spinning of the molecules and their ether sets up the ether tensions or electro-static strains, the equalization of ether tensions sets up ether motions or electric currents, and the orbital movements produce the effects of electro and permanent magnetism." If one might paraphrase the concluding sentence in the above and make it appropriate to the planetary movements, it would run as follows: "The spinning of the planets in their ethereal envelopes generates a force which attracts or repels other planets, the equalization of those tendencies of attraction and repulsion induce the great life current of the solar system, and the movements of the planets in their orbits cause those planetary conditions and changes which determine the vitality of the universe in all its parts.'

This still approaches the consideration of causes from the materialistic point of view and possibly does not recognize a supreme controlling power which determines, or at least, affects even the movement of the atom. But the illustration is helpful, for knowing these molecules and atoms to be inspired by living forces, we can see how the smaller organism may affect the larger, the interplay of the molecules producing those physical sensations which often become an important factor in determining our conduct.

Returning, however, from this digression to a consideration of the effects of interatomic activity upon the possibilities wrapped up in each atom, we find that the contact of atom with atom wakes up these sleeping potentialities, and there arises the consciousness of the molecule. The cell is built from the interplay of molecular activities. More and more complex organisms spring into existence to meet the requirements of an ever-widening consciousness—an ever-brightening intelligence. The differentiation into the many provides the mechanism by which the latent consciousness in each is wakened into active powers. The contact of the external world, beating upon the wall of matter which encases the consciousness, finally induces by its continuous repetition a state of activity of the life within which our scientists in one phase of its manifestation have termed "nervous excitability;" i. e., power possessed by the within to respond to the without. The exciting cause is the vibration proceeding from the without to the within, while the inciting cause may be looked upon as the potential intelligence within. Thus sensation arises. In later stages, when the consciousness is sufficiently evolved to cognize the connection between the exciting cause and the sensation, percepts arise—a recognition of the operation of the great law of cause and effect has taken place.

The whole process of evolution is but the traveling up on the one side of the circle of being, involution having marked the descent on the other side. But mark the difference: While involution deals with but the unified consciousness, force and substance, (in other words, with universal entity, bringing it to a stage where the one finally differentiates into the many), evolution starts in with that lowest stage of deific development, and in its upward march carries all these differentiated units of consciousness through the various stages which universal consciousness traversed in its descent, retracing the steps; thus gradually lifting the separate unit up to the highest level of deific consciousness and power. God sleeps in the atom. Man is a potential deity.

The Evolution of Life.

There are two phases of the law of evolution. Physical science has dealt largely with the objective side, the evolution of the form. That long list of brilliant men of science, culminating in Charles Darwin, who insisted upon evolution as a fact in nature, have forced the acceptance of their view by the thought of this age. Yet only the half-truth seems to have been fully caught. There is, as we have seen, an evolution of ever more complex forms, a refining of the nervous organism from the simple speck of protoplasm through all grades to the developed human being with his specialized nervous system. But why this evolution of form? It is not an end in itself. The evolution of form is only in order that the evolving life which animates the successive forms may have fuller means of expression, wider fields of activity, increased opportunities for coming into contact with the external world. The evolution of the conscious life is the great object of nature's effort. The evolution of the forms successively occupied thereby is but the modification of the objective rendered necessary by the progress of its subjective. Physical science, dealing too exclusively with the material, has been oblivious of the more important and basic spiritual, with the result that the philosophy of the one-sided evolution has, in its expression "the survival of the fittest," become the justification of the rule of might, of the oppression of the weak by the strong, of a forgetfulness of the great unity of the human race. Yet its tendency has been to rise gradually to a more exalted view of nature. Doctor Edward L. Youmans (introduction to "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces") indicates the fruits of progress in astronomic research; the tendency exhibited herein being, as he says, characteristic in a marked degree of all modern science: "The earliest explanations of the celestial movements were thoroughly and grossly material, and all astronomic progress has been toward more refined and ideal views. The heavenly bodies were at first thought to be supported and carried round in their courses by solid revolving crystalline spheres to which they were attached. This notion was afterwards replaced by the more complex and mobile mechanism of epicycles. To this succeeded the hypothesis of Des Cartes who rejected the clumsy mechanical explanation of revolving wheel work, and proposed the more subtile conception of ethereal currents which constantly whirled around in vortices, and bore along the heavenly bodies. At length the labors of astronomers, terminating with Newton, struck away these crude devices, and substituted the action of a universal immaterial force. The course of astronomic science has thus been on a vast scale to withdraw attention from the material and sensible, and to fix it upon the invisible and supersensuous. It has shown that a pure principle forms the immaterial foundation of the universe. From the baldest materiality we rise at last to a truth of the spiritual world, of so exalted an order that it has been said 'to connect the mind of man with the Spirit of God.'"

The evolution of the soul is the complement of the evolution of the form, and in the complete philosophy thus made possible a rational basis of ethics is provided.

The Theosophic Teachings Summarized.

Those who are conversant with the Theosophical Teachings now flooding Western literature, will at once recognize how closely the most recent of scientific theories are, in the above respect, in accord with them.

In those teachings the manifested universe is regarded as the manifestation of a Divine Being through whose parts life energies play and consciousness functions, and force and substance bear mutual relations analogous to that seen in man himself. Not the idea of an extra-cosmic deity with which we are so familiar, and which, as presented to us by our theologians, has repelled many of the brightest intellects and noblest souls in all ages; but an intracosmic Being which permeates everywhere, includes everything, and in which, using the words of St. Paul, "We live and move and have our being." In the words of Alexander Pope,

> "All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
> Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

Mrs Anne Besant (the Ancient Wisdom p. 55) thus tersely summarizes the Theosophic teachings: "The word 'spirit-matter' is used designedly. It implies the fact that there is no such thing as 'dead' matter; all matter is living, the tiniest particles are lives.

"Science speaks truly in affirming: 'No force without matter, no matter without force,' they are wedded together in an indissoluble marriage throughout the ages of the life of a universe, and none can wrench them apart. Matter is form, and there is no form which does not express a life, and there is no life that is not limited by a form. Even the Logos, the Supreme Lord, has during manifestation the universe as His form, and so down to the atom.

"This involution of the life of the Logos as the ensouling force in every particle, and its successive enwrapping in the spirit-matter of every plane so that the materials of each plane have within them in a hidden, or latent condition, all the form—and force—possibilities of all the planes above them as well as those of their own—these two facts make evolution certain and give to the very lowest particle the hidden potentialities which will render it fit—as they become active powers—to enter into the forms of the highest beings. In fact, evolution may be summed up in a phrase: It is latent potentialities becoming active powers."

In Conclusion.

The extracts which we have gathered show that the experiments and discoveries of our scientific friends have led them to the following conclusions, namely: That Matter is fundamentally homogeneous, though temporarily assuming its Protean forms as it is subjected to the influence of the varying degrees of force: That there is one Force in the universe, though its rates of vibration and grades of expression are infinite in number, as it endeavors to swing all grades and forms of matter under the behest of its imperious Law; That there is a structural unity based upon a common prototypal form: That all Consciousness is linked and bound together in an all-embracing whole whose myriad aspects serve to mark the path of evolution and to spur each individual member on to progress: That through the whole realm of nature the One Life pulsates and stirs the tiniest particle as well as the most complex organism. One Substance, One Force, One Form, One Consciousness, One Life: That each of these is but a varying aspect of one great Reality behind. Thus scientific imagination suggests and Theosophical doctrines assert. But a union of force, matter, form, life and consciousness, each within certain comparatively narrow limits, gives as a product, the human being, organic because of the interplay of these factors. Judging then from analogy, when we find these factors united on the universal scale of being, we are justified in coming to the conclusion that the product there is a Supreme Intelligence working within the manifested universe as its living organism. Indeed these are almost the exact words of the great surgeon and pathologist, Dr. Pirogoff, of St. Petersburg, who was regarded by his contemporaries as "the very incarnation of expert science and methods of thought." In his posthumous Memoirs he affirms his belief in "An intelligent Universe and the activity of forces working in it harmoniously and intelligently;" and states his conviction; That his Ego is "an embodiment of a common universal mind," "infinite and eternal; which rules and governs the ocean of life," "directing the forces and elements toward the formation of organisms."

There indeed Science and Religion find their common ground. By different routes they reach the same goal. The Brotherhood of Man and the Fatherhood of God are no longer mere phrases appealing to the emotions, for they are now recognized as statements of facts in nature.

Since we are all bound together in one common enterprise in which progress is hastened through the harmony of its parts, altruism becomes profound wisdom, selfishness a mark of ignorance, and the highest codes of ethics are the most scientific expression of nature's laws.

[The End.]

THE GREAT QUESTION.

If a Man Die, Shall He Live Again?

"For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again. As the waters fail from the sea, and it drieth up, so man lieth down, and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

A most emphatic utterance, and it was said by Job, one of the best and wisest men of antiquity. But in that, his answer, was he mistaken? The question of questions most vital and most absorbing of all. If those who are curious and anxious will take up Harpers' Magazine for April, and turn to page 786 and read what follows under the heading, "Results of Psychical Research," by Dr. James H. Hyslop, they will find what purports to be an answer to that great and absorbing question. And if such deductions are accepted as truth, then Job must have been mistaken. It is an abstract from the Reports of the Society for Psychical Research, in England, embracing a score or more of titled and distinguished names, and also reports from an American branch of the same society, acting under the same name, Dr. Hodgson being the secretary and composed of individuals equally distinguished, of whom some are women.

Dr. Hyslop says: "I have myself had seventeen sittings with Mrs. Piper—twelve personally, and five by Dr. Hodgson in my absence in order to shut out direct telepathy, and under conditions effectually concealing my identity."

Now what is telepathy? That will be best understood by giving a definition by Sir William Crookes, one of the ablest, and also one of the promoters, of the English society.

"It would be well to begin with telepathy, with the fundamental law, as I believe it to be, that thoughts may be transferred from one mind to another without the agency of the recognized organs of sense—that knowledge may enter the human mind without being communicated by the recognized organs of sense."

Another definition: "It is the intercourse between spirit and spirit. We have proof that it does exist."—Lilian Whiting.

And this is the conclusion arrived at, deduced from so great a mass of testimony by Dr. Hyslop: "For myself, being reduced to a choice between an omniscient telepathy and communication with discarnate spirits, I simply prefer the latter hypothesis as the more rational of the two in our present state of knowledge regarding supernormal phenomena."

When I began I intended to reach the point now arrived at sooner, but the apparent necessity of preliminaries prevented. The only way or medium those investigations were obtained, was through the senses of seeing and hearing. It then practically resolves itself into the query, we might say conundrum: Are those faculties less acute and critical in the man who wields the hoe, or strikes the anvil, than those privileged to wear honored titles, assuming and being awarded deference, under the popular name of scientific investigation, etc? Again, there are some things believed, that are neither seen nor heard. An illustration: One and all of those distinguished scientists must believe that they are being carried many miles each hour through what is called space, because of an invisible silent Force, which holds him to the earth with a grip incomprehensible, and all unconscious, not recognized by one of the senses—with the moving world, in its daily revolution on its axis, and yearly circle round the sun.

Science cannot possibly know anything about invisible agencies or forces. Its knowledge is limited to visible and tangible things. The whole is beyond the reach and grasp of scientific research. There is no warrant for such assumption, it is altogether and wholly too exclusive.

For almost half a century, the same things from time to time have been published in newspapers and magazines, certified to by people of all ranks, grades and professions, and not infrequently received and treated with ridicule and contempt by that same element, dignified and august, demanding recognition because of titles conferred in the name of what is called science.

Among distinguished personages who certified to a belief in the genuineness of what fifty years ago was called the Rochester rappings, the mediums being the celebrated Fox sisters, were J. Fenimore Cooper and Dr. E. K. Kane of Arctic fame, who married the youngest of the Fox sisters, and from whom it is claimed messages have been received of most startling significance, in relation to the North Pole, and other things away out there; also from Sir John Franklin, and if such are correct, there is no further need of exploring expeditions.

Few living are in possession of so much varied and extended knowledge as W. H. Burr, of Washington, D. C. It embraces all departments of literature. He has repeatedly and publicly acknowledged his belief in these manifestations, and his investigations have been most thorough and critical, none more so.

The world is waiting with most intense solicitude what action those learned societies have taken, or will take regarding the many published reports, in the few months since the death of Col. Ingersoll. Such startling things as appeared in the Rochester Democrat and New York Star, have called out a mass of comment and inquiry, independent of all claimed through the medium of Mrs. Richmond. That in the New York Star, August 6, sworn to before a Notary, by John Templeton, editor of the Tammany Times, so soon after the death of Col. Ingersoll, has no parallel of its kind in print. Whoever can read it without emotion must be lacking human sympathy and feeling.

Perhaps in connection with what to some may appear as rather more than a mild criticism, that is all intended, however, the writer might say of himself, he was never in presence of a medium, or at a seance, but long before the advent of Spiritism, had accepted, in contradistinction of the theological dogma, the belief of Socrates and Plato, that the mind, spirit, soul, continued on, growing, expanding evermore.

MURDER AND SUICIDE.

A Medium's Thrilling Experience.

Yesterday I retired as usual to my seance room for an hour's silent communion with the spirit friends that usually come to me at such times. As I lapsed into a half-trance condition, I heard a spirit voice say, "Write," and as I write I hear the following:

"My God! Will I ever see the blessed light again?"

"Darkness ever surrounds me. Mortal man, can you aid me? Born out of the shadow-land of earth-life into the yet darker hell in spirit life, repentance comes too late. I seek the light and find it not. Am I to be forever damned? Suicide did not kill. My own hand could could not quench the vital spark that cannot be put out. I had hoped for utter oblivion at the end of earth life, and now I find eternal life instead. Oh! my God, will I ever reach the realm of light? I am not blind. Oh, no, for dim-lit horrors surround me always, and self-doomed humanity like myself bewail beside me in vain. I am not deaf, for I hear from out the depths of darkness that surround me the wail of lost souls in deepest agony! Earth's sorrows were unbearable, yet the realities of this agony are worse than earth's could ever be. Mortal man, can you aid me? Oh! help me, or I shall perish and be forever lost. But no—I cannot die."

I asked this spirit: "What is the trouble with you, and what is the cause of your darkened condition?"

The answer is: "Write, for now I get a glimpse of light, and I know that repentance and earth with its experience will help me. Hear my story, for I repent in sorrow and deepest humiliation.

"At twenty years of age I found myself by the death of a relative, possessed of a fortune for beyond my greatest expectations, and I set out to enjoy it to the fullest extent in riotous living and dissipation, or what is called in earth life high-toned fast life. I drank of the red wine cup to my fill. I turned night into day, and like a brute slept the bright hours of sunshine away in drunken sleep, and so lost my living soul. Well, in days of rest from debauchery I fell in love with one who is an angel now, dwelling in a heaven of light, in the realm of sunshine and joy. I see her at long intervals, for she yet tries her best to redeem me from this darkness and despair, just as she did in the long ago of earth existence. But a devil incarnate must have possessed me then, for I did not heed her warning, only at intervals. Viola, my darling, my earthly angel, of course at last gave me up in despair, and found a faithful and fond lover in a truer man, a manly man, of giant form, and a king in manhood and in intellect, and poor, deserted me, I only sunk deeper into the depths, into the vortex of misery that seemed my eternal doom.

"One day after I had restrained from debauchery for several months, I had, as my friends said, become quite a man, yet deep down in my soul I knew that I was quite a wreck. In my sober moments I purchased a fine old mansion that was standing upon the east bank of Niagara's deepest gorge, a few miles below the falls. It was a fine old mansion, situated all alone amid overshadowing elms that completely surrounded it, and I soon made the grounds around it a sort of an earthly paradise by turning them into flower gardens of great beauty. I thought that I might yet by this display win Viola back to myself again; but this hope was but a lingering one, for her manly lover held her fast, bound soul to soul, out of all temptations or charms of a worldly nature, for he was a giant with a giant's form, and a giant in sterling qualities compared with me.

"I could not blame Viola, but within my very soul I hated her lover, and could not blame her for loving so manly a man. They visited me often at Viola's request, but she did not know of the black hearted demon that slept within my being, or she would never have come to me in all her beauty and splendor, as she did in those halcyon days in the long ago; yet she had a hope that she might aid me to live out earth life in a manly and upright manner, while she would not dare to trust herself to my uncertain care.

"Time went on apace, and when the frenzy of a night's debauch came upon me I would shut the world out, and behind barred doors in my seclusion, curse my fate, a fate that I can now see was all my own making; but one day, one fatal day, found Viola and her lover enjoying my hospitality. I had but few servants, one an old half-deaf auntie, a conchman, or valet, and a gardener, and soon after I got possession of the mansion I built into the rock that formed the back wall of the house a vault large enough to hold what few valuables I possessed. I had a large iron door fitted almost air-tight against the steel shell of the safe or vault, with heavy burglar-proof locks upon it. Of course my visitors were curious enough to wish to examine it.

"Just before this, Viola had whispered to me that in one short week she was to be united to her faithful lover in marriage. Well now I ask you, do devils or demons unmerciful and wicked walk the earth in an unseen manner? I think so, for as soon as Viola and her lover stepped into that cursed vault, I sprang like a demon that I was and shut the door upon them. No cry could I hear through those walls of steel! No tears availed now, for I had as I thought shut them out of the world into utter oblivion forever. Who would know? No one saw them come to me; no one knew of the vault, for I had had it made in Pittsburg, and the workmen had dropped out of sight. I worked all night a desperate mad-man, to cover the walls with paper so that no man should know of this horrible secret but myself. No one knew, and death ended all—so I then thought.

"But, oh! my God, I knew—I knew, yet I gloated over my victory. Their bridal bed should be a couch of cold steel, and their honeymoon an eternal darkness, a hell. Their wedding-feast should be starvation. I hated them. How I drank and how I gloated over my act in a drunken frenzy over my victims' fate. Had I known as I know now that death did not end all; had I known that death out of earth existence was only the beginning of an eternal life—oh! had I known of the forever! Did fiends prompt me, or was it a fiend myself? Who knows? At last came remorse; at last came horrors; at last came upon my soul a weight of utter damnation, and at last came one night the angelic spirit of Viola, and in loving kindness she tried to soothe my tortured soul. She tried in vain, for that night, that horrible night, I drove in maddened fury a bullet through my shattered brain, yet in the hope that death ended all; and, oh! mortal, can you help me, for I am in a living hell of torture! Help me out of this utter misery, or I perish; yet I know I cannot perish. I find that I have added one more murder to the rest that I committed; one more crime to answer for—the crime of self-murder.

"Viola often comes to me as a ministering angel, but her coming so far only adds to my sorrows and makes my tortures a thousand-fold worse than they ever were in earth life. She is an angel now, and I am a demon yet.

"My property, the old mansion, has passed into other hands now, and I saw it torn down. I saw it all, for is not that sight a part of my hell? There upon the steel floor of the vault, after twenty years in darkness lay a giant skeleton of a human form, and in its bony arms, folded close to the chest was the little skeleton that once was Viola's, while a mass of dark hair mixed with Viola's golden tresses, tells the story of agony and love; tells how these lovers passed out of earth into the realm of spiritual glory faithful unto the last in earth life, and safe at last in that realm of supernal light beyond this earthly vale of tears in the home of the soul.

"And I, and I, a wailing and a weeping entity—a murderer in more senses than one, and a doomed suicide. I thought revenge was sweet, now I know that revenge is hell. Oh, mortal man, aid me. I dare not call upon the God of my fathers, for he could not hear me. Tell me, will I ever see the glorious light of a spiritual realm, that I know Viola dwells in? She wills that I shall de redeemed, but a soul blackened by suicide cannot enter the kingdom of spiritual heaven, in the eternal light of spiritual glory, so I return to this my utter damnation, to a howling wilderness of lost souls, where the wailing cry of suicides and murderers who must dwell in darkness for ages to come, until redeemed at last, they may reach a haven of rest. I ask for forgiveness, and long for that realm of light that belongs only to the pure and holy souls that have not known the horrors of a spiritual hell. I long for the realm that Viola dwells in. She comes to me now, an angel of glory, to try and show to my benighted soul the pathway toward the light. Must I return to my home now, where all is the blackest, darkest, deepest damnation. But I hope not forever. Oh! my God, aid me if you can."

I invite him to come again, and I hope to aid him to reach the royal road that will lead him to life and light beyond the realms that are only dark to the benighted souls that knew not of an eternal life before they left earth life by the route of suicide.

Wants to Change His Base.

Rev. Dr. McGiffert, whose head is still level, in the Madison Square Presbyterian pulpit on the 3d inst., is reported by the Associated Press to have said:

"In these days, when so much is said about creeds—old creeds, new creeds, creed revision, creeds as conditions of church membership or of ministerial standing; creeds as denominational platforms or as bases of church union—it is important that we should remind ourselves that not creed, but character, is the supreme aim of Christianity—that not in doctrine, but in life, the Christian ideal finds its full realization.

"Creeds are well enough in their place; doctrines are good so far as they go; but the best of creeds and the truest of doctrines become an impertinence when they thrust themselves into the forefront and so engage the attention of any church or of any man that the supreme emphasis is even temporarily removed from the supreme duty of following Christ."

It is doubtless true that Dr. McGiffert would make character the standing of church life, but, practically, are not a score expelled from the church for defective belief where one is dismissed for unworthy conduct? Belief is the very essence of Christian life, as was shown in these columns last week; and the church has acted in harmony with that idea through all its existence. It is questionable if there has been a Christian martyr during the history of the church who has died because of his immoral life; but millions have suffered, and thousands have been burned at the stake, for lack of faith in the "Lord Jesus."

Dr. McGiffert would make good conduct the test of Christian life; but this was not the plan with Jesus, neither was it with Paul. "All that believe are justified from all things." Acts 13:39. "Whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." Acts 10:43.

That great error of the church, the making of belief its corner-stone, has filled our penitentiaries with convicts, and on this account Spiritualists have made war on its creeds. Let them eliminate that pestiferous plank from their Bible, and their faith, and the corresponding obnoxious feature, vicarious atonement,—the idea that the junior God died in their place, a substitute for the sins of others,—then there will be hope of a speedy reformation of the world from the ills Christianity has engendered.

Gems of Real Merit.

The Progressive Thinker learns with great satisfaction that Mrs. Dr. Houghton-Chaapel, of Palmetto, Fla., has in press a small edition of her beautiful poems, several of which have appeared at various times in these columns, to the great pleasure of our readers. The Doctor's style is easy, flowing and rhythmic, while the thought is elevating and always instructive. For many years a teacher of prominence in the South, then, discarding her childhood creed, she gave rein to her literary acquirements by a regular course of medical study, graduating from two different medical colleges with the degree of M. D. Now, ripe with years and honors, with a goodly supply of earthly dross, and a devoted Spiritualist, she has built up a lovely home of her own among the orange groves of Florida; and there she thinks, and writes, and intellectually luxuriates, in constant communion with Nature, of which she is an ardent lover. If she can be persuaded to put her gems of poesy on the market we feel assured she will have a wide reading.

Deceptive Professions.

A young Kansas University student called upon a Kansas City lawyer at his office the other day: "Now what I want you to do," said the student, "is to advise me on a course of study in law. You see I've an aptitude for the law, for all my friends say I have a very good voice."—Kansas City Star.

Another student with a "very good voice," thinks he has an "aptitude" for theology, so he devotes his life to peddling the errors taught him by uneducated and unthinking parents. Once in the ministry if reason comes to his aid and he sees the falsity of his belief, he cannot change it, for he is good-for-nothing save to frighten sinners into goodness by threatening them with hell, else arousing their sympathies by depicting the agony of a dying God.

The so-called learned professions, law, physic, theology, allure students into paths where nine-tenths of them flounder for a time, while the fittest engage in commerce or the arts, but not one in a hundred makes a grand success of his calling.

Teach Us How to Believe.

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him shall not perish, but have everlasting life.—John 3:16.

The whole burden of Christianity, as taught in the New Testament, is a belief in the personality of Jesus. Without that belief there is no salvation. Mark 16:16, adds baptism as an additional necessity; but the late Bible revisers said in the margin of their rendering: "The two oldest Greek manuscripts, and some other authorities, omit from verse 9 to the end," hence it is clear that the requiring of baptism as indispensable to salvation is a priestly interpolation.

Eternal happiness, then, is the reward tendered us for believing in Jesus.

Will not some one be so kind as to teach a person how to believe a thing his judgment tells him is false, something that is obnoxious to his reason? We may muster courage to believe Joseph had a dream, as narrated in Mat. 1:20, and that it satisfied him that the Holy Ghost, a fraction of the Godhead, in fact God himself, was the parent of that Son, but there are those in this age who have found that dreams—whether waking or sleeping ones—are not always trustworthy; in truth they are reluctant to believe those visions of slumber were more reliable 1900 years ago than now.

The prayer of all must be, who wish salvation on the New Testament basis: "Teach us, O Lord, how to believe a thing our judgment condemns as false."

There is only one practical method known to The Progressive Thinker, and that is by hypnotism. Many have seen the duped subject swayed by every word and suggestion of a master mind, performing acts from which he would revolt when not under the influence of that subtle agent. He believes everything told him. Under that delusion mountains of granite are believed to be gold, and he can ride on imaginary telegraph lines to the most distant star. He can be transformed by a word into the lawyer at the bar, the judge on the bench, the preacher in the pulpit, or the doctor bending over an expiring patient. He can imitate Paul, and "become all things to all men," at the caprice of the operator. If under good control he can be made to believe virgins bear sons who are fathered by Gods, and will endorse any creed, however repulsive to his normal condition. Left under influence he will zealously maintain whatever was told him while under control. Time will relieve him from those false impressions, provided the influence is not repeated from time to time, just as the "redeemed" fall from grace who fall in regular attendance on the church. When the power is gone, and reason returns, then he becomes what is known in the church as a backslider. If a churchman, and he denounces the system by which he was robbed of his will power he is denounced as a renegade.

Now what we want is to know how to believe, without being psychologized, that which is impossible of belief; that which transcends Nature, and is inconsistent with all her known laws.

A Universal Religion.

The Literary Digest reports the Edinburgh Scotsman as expressing surprise that American Presbyterians wish to discipline ministers who reject the clauses in the Westminster Confession which relates to the total depravity of man, the eternal damnation of non-elect infants, and the unending pains of hell. Few Presbyterians in Scotland, it says, trouble their heads about the clause in the Confession to which Dr. Hillis recently referred. Indeed, the Presbyterians of both Scotland and England have for some time possessed a revised form of the Confession, from which these features are eliminated. A religious writer, commenting on this fact, lately remarked: "There are Roman Catholics who are more Catholic than the Pope, so American Presbyterians appear more Calvinistic than they in the land of Knox and the Covenanters."

This is good news to all of us. If Scotch Presbyterians have become sufficiently civilized to reject total depravity, an endless hell, and vicarious suffering, American Presbyterians must inevitably fall into line, as must all other sects. This done, then why a victim in sacrifice to redeem man from a condition that never existed? If there was no fall there was no need of a Savior. And if no Savior the whole system of Christianity is a failure; for the whole hinges on the fall and the atonement. The triple-headed God will next disappear. Reason will be reenthroned; the truths of Spiritualism will become paramount; all the religions of the world can then unite on a common platform and proclaim from every pulpit, and mosque, and pagoda, and even from Pagan altars, "There is no God but God, one and indivisible, and he alone will reign forever."

The Voice of the Scholar.

Rev. R. Heber Newton, whose name has become a household word among religious thinkers in America, because of his scholarship, rector of All Souls' Church, Protestant Episcopal, of New York, in "Mind," for May, said:

"Our age sees an era closely paralleling the period in which Protestantism broke from the great Catholic Church. Again man's mind is teeming with new, fresh thought. Novel knowledges are streaming in upon him from every side. The whole horizon of his outlook has changed. His mind is feasting with new ideas. The old experience renews itself—a vast growth from the soul of man, alike of good and of evil, demanding once more an authority capable of sifting the true from the false and of deciding between the right and the wrong. Never was authority more needed than to-day—provided it be the right sort of authority. Never was authority more craved than to-day—so that it be an authority to which man's mind and conscience can cheerfully bow."

The Reverend Doctor went on to say:

"The historical study of the origins of the church has impeached its claim to be a divine institution," then he tells us the critical study of the Bible "has disposed forever of the claim that it is such an oracle of God as we can submit our intellects to unquestionably." He has the courage further to say—"The Church, the Bible and Reason disagree radically and widely, and that the ultimate court of appeal is to Reason."

When men of brains and education are free to express themselves thus bravely, it is prudent to let mossbacks clinging to the errors of the past have lee room, to object to the exposure of the wrongs of the church which has been mainly instrumental in enthroning Reason again, after it had been silenced for ages by authority of the church, so far as related to religious matters.

"Love—Sex—Immortality." By Dr. W. P. Phelon. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

Rubbish Heaps.

Said Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, in his Brooklyn pulpit two Sundays ago:

"In the church we have no end of rubbish and theological rag-pickers."

Webster defines Rubbish as "Waste, or rejected matter; anything worthless; a mass or heap of good-for-nothing things; valueless stuff."

Probably Rev. Hillis could not have found another word in the English language which would have been so expressive of the worn-out and worthless debris of the church. Volumes could be written descriptive of theological bric-a-brac, which has been collecting in ecclesiastical garrets "from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." These discarded follies and inhumanities of ye olden time, have given place to others no more valuable; but having the advantage of being more modern. The burning of heretics and witches has been followed with persecution and social ostracism by which misery of the victim is protracted into years instead of a few agonizing minutes.

As the mind's eye surveys the multitudinous piles of discarded "good-for-nothings" in creeds, essentials as formerly taught by God's anointed for the soul's salvation, still other trash held sacred greets the observer. Advanced as is Dr. Hillis, he clings to that junior God as the ark of safety for those ambitious of heavenly rewards. While he rejects many of the fables of the Bible he worships the god confined in a box, called an ark, drawn by bellowing cows over the planes of Judea, before which David, clothed only with joy, leaped and danced in great glee when that god which the English translators capitalized and made appear as the Creator of the Universe. The god to whom Solomon built a "high place," in the Valley of Hinnom; to whom babies were sacrificed, was a near relative of the god who so delighted David, as he was to Ashtoreth, the shameful goddess of the Zidonians. True, they tell us Solomon had relapsed into idolatry; but, pray, when were not the Jews idolators, until as slaves they came in contact with Zoroastrianism in Persia?

It is a real pleasure to see the old rubbish heaps of discarded faiths daily swelling; but the joy will be more intense as those hills of error swell into mountains by the addition of a vast amount of worthless and effete "stuff" which, besides its noisome odor, casts a shadow over the glories about to beam in effulgence on a lately benighted world.

Ex-Preacher Interviewed.

Ex-Rev. John W. Arney, the Michigan clergyman who cultivated fast horses, preached Methodism fifteen years, "converted 2,000 souls, and was reprimanded by Bishop Newman, at the direction of his Conference, virtually because he raised better and faster horses than his agricultural brothers, was recently interviewed by some press correspondent. During that interview the censured ex-clergyman is reported to have said:

"I didn't think then of racing my horses as Jesus would." He gives as a reason for such breach of duty, that at that time he had never heard of Rev. Sheldon, who edited the Topeka Capital as Jesus would.

The difference between the preacher and Jesus seems to have been, the latter owned his horses, having raised them from colts; while Jesus played Jayhawker, and pressed the animals he wanted into his service, giving as a reason for such appropriation, "The Lord hath need of them." See Mat. 21:3.

Ex-Rev. Arney's observation, after he left the ministry, is corroborative with that of the worldling generally. He said:

"The thing that has most impressed me since I have come in contact with the world as a layman is the little I really knew about people when I was still preaching. Everybody then had on his Sunday face and his Sunday manners. Now I see men as they really are in their intercourse with one another, and I am surprised at the change. I find that men are very much alike—Christians and those who are worldly act just about the same."

Probably Mr. Arney had no thought of the point he made in that last paragraph. Save on Sundays Christians and so-called world's people cannot be distinguished the one from the other by their conduct; but the "Sunday face and Sunday manners" are shown, particularly in the presence of the officiating preacher.

Is it not possible some impious wretch will be so cruel as to suggest that the metamorphosed from a worldling on Saturday, into a long-faced goody on Sunday, is acting the part of a hypocrite for the reward such services are expected to bring?

Christian Conquest.

Now a war of the Christian nations, in which the United States joins, to dragoon the Chinese empire, with its 300,000,000 subjects, into submission to missionary rule. No one nation felt strong enough to put down the opposition to priestly dictation, so all the great Christian powers united their forces. Two of our great war vessels are already in Chinese waters, and the third is on its way there.

Admiral Kempff, commanding the United States battle-ship Newark, telegraphed the Secretary of the Navy, from mouth of the Pei-Ho River, June 5:

"The engagement has commenced. Have landed 50 more seamen—battalion of marines."

The British, Germans, French, Italians and Austrians will make common cause with the United States. Russia and Japan are reported at last advices as we write, in sympathy with China. Adds a late dispatch:

"There are grave fears for the missionaries in the outlying districts. They number hundreds, and the stations are isolated."

To protect those hundreds of priestly agitators, who are trying to supplant a religion many times better adapted to the needs of the Chinese than is Christianity, another great war, in which in all probability countless thousands of lives will be sacrificed, is sprung upon the world.

The founders of the American government never contemplated engaging in wars of Christian conquest, either single handed or by "entangling alliances."

Hon. James B. Townsend.

Mr. Townsend, president of King Solomon's Mining Company, together with its chemist, electrician and mining engineers, passed through Chicago on their way to the mines and stopped long enough to say, "Brother Francis, please mention in your next issue that the Spiritualists still have one week in which to write to the office of the company in Lima, Ohio, for the 20-cent stock, and that as sure as the first of July comes, the price will advance to fifty cents."

TELL-TALE MIRROR.

The Laughable Story It Told. LESSON DERIVED THEREFROM

—:o:—

It is said that "it was in one of those churches where the organ faces the congregation, and it was several minutes before the time to begin service. The organist had taken his seat in front of his instrument, and of the choir only the soprano had arrived. The curtains, which are supposed to screen the indiscretions of the musicians from the gaze of the congregation, were tightly drawn, but the inclined mirror over the music rack, which informs the organist of the minister's movements during the service, was in good working order. The musical pair, however, neglected properly to consider the fact that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection. The result was that a portion of the congregation were put into a frame of mind scarcely proper for the beginning of the service by certain pronounced passages of con amore that were conveyed to their eyes by the tell-tale mirror. They suddenly ceased upon the arrival of the rest of the choir."

This indiscretion on the part of the musical pair, while no doubt serenely enjoyed by them, was regarded as outrageously out of place when reflected in the mirror. Its discovery constituted a "flagrant indiscretion," and therein was the sin—from a worldly point of view. Those who are skillful enough when having amusement of this kind to avoid mirrors or exposure, the world then can judge them not, and their standing in society is not impaired in the least. If Beecher and Mrs. Tilton had been more secretive, more cautious, more careful in their love-making, there never would have been that scandal to shock the world, ultimating in the ruin of the latter. What the gossiping community don't know, they can't arraign before the bar of public opinion, and pass sentence upon and in the future condem.

Sins that are carefully concealed do not arouse any scandal, but once let them become known and the excitement runs high.

It would be well for those who commit little or large indiscretions to know that there is a mirror in nature—omnipresent—that reflects them all. True, they are invisible to mortal eyes, yet to the angelic world they are always known, and psychometrically are liable to be revealed at any time. A little love-making behind the curtain of a church is just as nice, and just as sweet, just as divinely wholesome, and just as God-like as if made anywhere else; but foolish mortals who had done the same things themselves repeatedly, look askance and smile when the same is reflected from some tell-tale church mirror, and protest loudly against such trifles. While Nature conceals nothing, in a psychometric point of view, she no doubt greatly prefers that two who are deeply in love shall, before indulging in sweet caresses, study the relations of the angle of incidence to that of reflection, in connection with any tell-tale mirror that may be at hand, and thus avoid a foolish scandal.

Love-making is constantly having a run—it is the only perpetual motion that has been going on since the morning of creation. It is as common to the king as peasant; as nice to the philosopher as to the simple minded artisan; as genial to the poet as to the practical every-day-sort of man; as necessary to the devout minister of the gospel as to a sinful farmer; and being so common, where the angle of incidence equals the angle of reflection and a tell-tale mirror reveals all, don't make a boisterous noise, but enjoy the "circus," just as you did yourself in your younger days, and say nothing. If you only happen to Locate the Truth, then you can see how sweet it would be to monopolize the whole thing yourself.

A Trickster and Fraud.

Geo. Zellner—or a young man claiming that name—was a few years ago in Sioux City, Iowa. He claimed to be a remarkable medium. Commendatory items from Sioux City flowed in upon us, endorsing him as a most wonderful medium. The president of one of the societies there endorsed him. A testimonial with many names attached also came to us, lauding him to the very skies. Never having seen the name of this man mentioned in any of the Spiritualist papers, we refused to publish the fulsome commendations that came to hand.

Finally, to top the climax of artful villainy, Zellner married the daughter of a family in excellent standing in the community, and shortly after deserted her, and left for fresh fields to carry on his nefarious work. He did not possess any mediumship whatever, but by tricks and arts of which he was master, he deceived the Spiritualists all along the line. He had a fair exterior, yet he was a vile monster within, and could almost deceive the very elect with his bogus spirit manifestations. The young lady whom he married, says:

"He would hold so-called circles. Those present would all join hands, and we would have trumpet speaking, floating of instruments, touches, raps and many other things—all performed by my husband. He would have the circle join hands and he would hold the hands of the parties on both sides of him with his one hand, and float the guitar, give raps, speak through the trumpet, and do many other things."

This monster in human shape who so easily deceived the gullible Spiritualists of Iowa, is no doubt afloat somewhere swindling the people with his sleight-of-hand performance, and bringing disgrace upon our cause. Of course, he is working now under a different name, somewhere, in carrying forward his nefarious work.

It is no trouble for these fakes to secure endorsements of leading Spiritualists in the community in which they happen to be. Unable to detect their tricks, the next thing is fulsome endorsement and other Spiritualists are misled.

The trumpet seance affords the best field for the operation of the villainous tricksters. They give a wonderful test "which nobody could have known save the 'spirit' who gave it," and that establishes their reputation at once and woe be to the one who dares expose them! He is denounced in bitter terms.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says:

"Stand not aloof nor apart,
Plunge in the thick of the fight;
There in the street and the mart,
That is the place to do right.
Not in some cloister or cave,
Not in some kingdom above,
Here, on this side of the grave,
Here should we labor and love."

DO DOGS HAVE SOULS

Some at Least Ought to Have. ANIMALS IN SPIRIT LIFE.

—:o:—

It is not our intention in this issue to enter into an elaborate discussion as to whether animals have immortal spirits or not. Eminent writers differ widely on the subject, and the reasons which each one gives to sustain his opinions, are worthy of careful consideration. John Wesley, eminent as a theologian, and founder of a religious sect, expressed the belief that his dog Carlo "would wag his tail before him in Glory." Robert Dale Owen relates the case where the apparition of a dog walked into his master's house, while his body (only a few moments dead) lay chained fast to the kennel. A singular instance is related of a fine dog belonging to the late Wm. Cunningham, of Galesburg, Ill., who was killed by the cars. When the news of the accident was conveyed to Mrs. Cunningham, the dog was in the house. From the woman's outcries of grief the animal seemed at once to comprehend the nature of the accident, and joined lustily in the cries of its mistress. The dog carried on so that the family became alarmed and sent for a policeman to kill it, thinking it mad. The officer refused to shoot, saying that instead of being rabid, the dog was only grief-stricken at the death of its master. In the course of an hour the animal fell over backward and expired. The dog before the accident to his master showed no signs of sickness.

Some years ago G. W. Christine visited some of the monasteries of the monks of St. Bernard for the purpose of seeing the manner in which the St. Bernard dogs are trained to their life work, and published the result of his visit in the Chicago Evening Journal. There he realized for the first time what a grand, noble thing the education of even a dog may be when it has a high and lofty aim. The monks begin to teach their dogs in the earliest stages of puppyhood, and not only is physical and mental training included in this teaching, but spiritual culture is by no means neglected. At meal time the dogs all sit in a row each with a tin dish before him containing his repast. Grace is said by one of the monks, the dogs sitting motionless, meanwhile with reverentially bowed heads. Not one of them stirs until the "amen" is spoken. If some young novitiate should venture to taste the contents of his dish ere the arrival of the proper time some of the older dogs forthwith cause him to desist by deep admonitory growls and sharp pullings of the ear.

The intelligence displayed by these animals in rescuing travelers is simply marvelous, though perhaps it will be said it is only memory that they show, for all that they do has been most carefully taught them by the monks. After a severe snow-storm or an avalanche two dogs are sent out from the monastery alone. Around the neck of one is fastened a flask of cordial, on the back of the other is bound a heavy blanket. If a traveler lies buried in the snow their keen scent soon brings them to him. Then they search for the place where the snow is the softest, for they know that it is the warmth of the traveler's breath that has made it so, and that beneath that spot must be his head. They scratch away the snow, and when the unfortunate's head and breast are exposed they devote all their efforts to arousing him from that lethargic slumber into which he has fallen—the sure precursor of that terrible end—freezing to death. With their powerful paws they smite him on the chest and face. With their mouths close to his ear they give vent to loud barks and cries. Meanwhile two other dogs, accompanied by the monks have left the monastery a short time after the former ones, whose trail they follow, the result that the almost frozen traveler soon finds himself well housed and fed and restored to warmth and life. Few people have any idea of the immense number of lives that have been saved in this manner by these dogs. In the British Museum there is the stuffed skin of "Berry," the most famous of all St. Bernard dogs, who enjoyed a well verified record of having saved forty lives.

In view of the facts presented we think that the dog—the advanced dog—the progressive dog—the dog that has evolved beyond the nature and instincts of the common cur, is entitled to respectful consideration from the hands of that Law, or Reason, or Deity, or whatever you may call it, that confers immortality. Such a dog is superior in many respects to certain bipeds designated as human beings who live in our large cities. A good dog would not come amiss, as John Wesley, suggests, even in heaven.

A Matter of Regret.

It is with extreme regret we learn from an announcement of its publisher, that with the June issue the Lyceum brings its existence to a close. It perishes for lack of proper support on the part of Spiritualists.

From the initial number until the last, under the care of Mr. Clifford The Lyceum has been of ideal excellence, both in literary matter and in typography. Each number has been a bright and beautiful gem, well adapted to the purposes for which the paper was founded—the especial benefit of children and lyceums. It has been excelled by no paper ever established with such object in view. In aim and in concrete fulfillment in its quality, it has merited highest praise and support. Some of the best and most capable writers in the Spiritualist ranks gave of their choicest efforts to enrich its columns.

But, it is sad to relate the fact, Mr. Clifford, though working hard with his own hands and brain to carry it to success, has found himself unable to continue its publication, for lack of financial support.

Or, if not unable, he does not consider it his duty to carry on the warfare at his own individual expense—while thousands of Spiritualists send their children to orthodox Sunday-schools and aid in supporting the same and their literature—and, perhaps, only indicate their Spiritualism by paying dollars to see wonderful fraudulent materializations, etc.

In plain words, it is a shame, a disgrace to Spiritualism, that Mr. Clifford's praiseworthy enterprise should fail of success, because of lack of interest on the part of Spiritualists.

We wish that in some kind way he might be supplied with the necessary means to take up again and carry on The Lyceum to desired success. Surely it is a good and needful work, worthy of all good help from those who have the love of Spiritualism in their hearts. There is need of such a paper—and the want of it is a distinct loss to Spiritualism.

GOLD IN VISIONS.

Wonderful Findings in Dreams. REALIZATIONS IN PROOF.

—:o:—

Superstition plays a large part in gold mining. If the facts were generally known, says a Denver (Col.) letter to the Chicago Record, it would be proved that a majority of the mines in this State are being operated as much on account of some hint from unseen forces as from the advice of material experts.

First and foremost, the Colorado prospector puts faith in his own judgment, but he is not averse to having that judgment backed by spiritualistic advice, so, as soon as he stakes out his claim, he frequently seeks a "medium" and has a "reading" over a piece of surface ore. On account of the large patronage from the ranks of the prospectors and miners Colorado supports an immense number of clairvoyants and seers of every description, and all of them claim to be able to tell what is many feet below the surface of the ground merely by looking at a piece of ore that is taken from the top.

Perhaps the most notable example of mine operating largely on the strength of spiritualistic advice is found in the Geyser mine at Silver Cliff, Col. This is the deepest mine in Colorado, being 2,250 feet below the surface. The mine takes its name from its peculiar geological formation. It is being sunk in the center of what was evidently once a volcano crater. When the work was started years ago the miners found round, hard stones almost like the "hard heads" which are used for paving city streets. When these were cracked open a small kernel of gold ore was found in the center. This kernel did not run high in value, being infinitesimal, but it encouraged the prospectors to keep on. It was figured that these rocks were formed when the last eruption took place in the volcano crater. It was estimated that as the shaft was sunk deeper larger rocks and comparatively larger gold kernels would be found. On this theory the work was carried on until a depth of several hundred feet was reached. Then capital gave out, and the mine would probably have been abandoned had not a clairvoyant claimed to have received information that if the work was pushed so much deeper fabulous values would be struck.

Armed with this information, the promoters went East. Boston capitalists were interested, and it is claimed that they were also given first hand the spiritual information about the reward awiting those who persevered in the work. With plenty of capital back of the mine an immense hoist was built, the elevator being unique in that it contains a passenger section for the use of the stockholders or officers who may wish to visit the mine. The work was pushed vigorously, though there was no ore in sight, and the determined promoters sunk 1,100 feet without striking a sign of encouragement. At last, however, ore bodies were opened up, and now it is reported that the mine is on the road to prosperity, though no statement has been given out as to whether the prophecies of the spiritualistic adviser have been fully realized.

A similar case has come to public attention near Boulder, Col. Thomas J. Shelton, of "vibration" fame, having located a mine near that city and having secured capital to work the property through an alleged vision. Shelton is a Kentuckian, who has been engaged in many different enterprises, including newspaper work and preaching. While engaged in the publishing business in Little Rock, Ark., it is said he had a dream which brought him to Colorado. In his dream he saw a spot on the slope of a mountain, near Boulder. The spot was firmly impressed on his memory, and in 1898 he located a claim on a mountain slope that seemed to correspond in every way with the location pictured in his mind. No difficulty was experienced in raising capital and the work of developing the property has progressed steadily, though no ore of any promise has been encountered. In spite of this discouraging circumstance, the promoter is not worried a particle, as he claims to have been told, to a fraction of a foot, at what depth the pay ore would be struck. This depth has not yet been reached, so it is claimed.

Besides his Copper Rock mine, as the property is called, Shelton operates a "vibration" office. Through the influence of his mind he claims to be able to give people advice that will result in wealth and fame. He has an office force that is kept busy dictating answers to correspondents in all parts of the world, who want these "vibrations." The letters are said to contain the "vibrations." Nobody can see them, but the promoter says they are there and he has convinced so many persons that he is speaking the truth that he is making a large income at $1 per "vibration."

Important Decision.

A decision was handed down June 14, by Circuit Court Judge Thayer, St. Louis, Mo., in the case of the American School of Magnetic Healing, S. A. Weltmer and J. H. Kelley, complainants, vs. J. M. McAnnulty, postmaster of Nevada, Mo. The opinion holds that the direction given by the Postmaster General to withhold mail sent to complainants and return it to the senders marked "fraudulent" is legal. An injunction restraining McAnnulty was denied.

The Postmaster General, in pursuance of an act of Congress, directed McAnnulty to send all letters addressed to the complainants back to the senders and mark "fraudulent" upon them, or to transmit them to the dead letter office at Washington. This order contained a finding to the effect that the American School of Magnetic Healing, with its president and secretary, were engaged in a scheme to obtain money through the mail by means of fraudulent representations.

A bill of complaint was thereupon filed by the complainants to obtain an injunction restraining McAnnulty from carrying out this order.

MYSTERIOUS WAYS

Of an Infinite Intelligence. SOME REFLECTIONS THEREON

—:o:—

According to Professor Forbes, as set forth in a city paper, the eminent entomologist who has made careful experiments and observations regarding the subject, one-half of the apple crop of Illinois is annually destroyed by the apple worm, the caterpillar of the codling moth, involving a loss each year to the farmers and fruit growers of the State of more than $2,375,000. The annual destruction to the apple crop by this pest and consequent loss to the farmer in the country at large is estimated to be $25,000,000—and yet, according to Professor Slingerland, the entomologist of Cornell University at Ithaca, N. Y., not one fruit grower in ten ever saw a codling moth, although it is busy at work every season in their orchards by the tens of thousands, and moths of almost every other kind are a familiar sight to the farmer and fruit grower. The reason for this is that the codling moth does not have the universal habit of other moths, that of being attracted by a light or flame at night, and it so completely secrets itself during the day that the most violent disturbance of its retreats rarely causes it to take wing or to emerge from its hiding places about the orchard trees, the rough, scaly bark of which it so closely resembles that even if one were resting on the exterior of the bark of the tree it would defy the sharpest eye to detect it. A flaming torch placed at night under every tree in an orchard would fail to draw a single codling moth from its work of egg laying in the trees, although its numerous varieties of cousins would be hastening from all directions to meet destruction in the fascinating blaze.

The codling moth emerges from its cocoon about ten days after the apple blossoms have fallen from the trees in the spring, by which time the young fruit is grown sufficiently for the moth's purpose. The cocoons are beneath the scaly bark on the apple tree trunks. The moth, which is about half an inch long, comes out at night, and at once begins depositing its eggs. A codling moth's egg is nearly flat, and no larger than a small pin head. So small is it, and almost imperceptible on the apple, that although the codling moth has been known to naturalists nearly three centuries, it was only four years ago that its eggs were positively identified and described. The moth places but one egg on an apple. If one codling moth finds that another one has already deposited an egg on an apple it does not leave one of its own there, but seeks unpre-empted fruit. Each moth lays from 80 to 100 eggs. The egg hatches a tiny worm at the end of ten days, always at night. The worm at once crawls to the blossom end of the apple, enters the cavity there, and tunnels its way to the core, where it feasts and fattens on the heart of the apple, and tunnels its way to the surface at the end of a month, emerging a plump, pink worm, three-quarters of an inch long, always coming out at night. It makes its way without delay to the trunk of the tree, where it spins about itself its silken cocoon, beneath a sheltering scale of bark, and remains there in hiding until it in turn develops into a moth, to continue the perpetuation of its pestiferous kind.

Tiny as the codling moth's egg is there is a fly so small that it can deposit as many as four of its own eggs in a single egg of the moth. The fly's eggs hatches worms that devour the moth's embryo in the egg, and thus hosts of the ravenous insects are destroyed before they have begun active life. Other parasitic enemies of the caterpillar make way with untold numbers of the insects at that stage of their existence, and night birds destroy myriads of the moths. Vast numbers of the cocoons are uncovered and their contents devoured by woodpeckers and other insectiverous birds, but enough come to maturity to levy on the farmers of the country a bounty of $25,000,000 a year to keep them in board and lodging. Nothing but spraying the tree with a solution of Paris green has any effect in checking the ravages of the pest and decreasing the annual loss in crop, and this spraying the farmer, as a rule, resolutely persists in not doing.

Here, Spiritualists, you have something for reflection. The National Association should put on its "thinking cap" and determine whether Infinite Intelligence created the "Codling Moth" to annoy poor mortals, or whether its introduction into the world was not the result of the ingenuity of his Satanic Majesty, or Natural Law inherent in matter. Spend your idle moments, philosopher, in solving this problem.

OUR PREMIUMS.

There are many Spiritualists who know a good thing when they see it. There are others, however, who do not seem to realize what is going on around them, and therefore miss many chances to enrich their minds and enlarge their understanding. Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World is furnished to our subscribers at less than cost, and should be in every family in the United States, whether Spiritualists or not. Volumes 1, 2 and 3 constitute a wonderful magazine of thought on Death in its multifarious phases; in fact you can not find in all the libraries of the world as valuable information in regard to Death as you will have presented to you in these three volumes. They are nicely printed, neatly and substantially bound, and are an ornament to any library. Volume 3 is furnished at 25 cents, much less than the actual cost to us, and the three volumes, when ordered in connection with a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker, only cost $1.10. The aggregate cost of the three books to the trade is $4.50. At this price, these three books ought to be in every Spiritualist family.

MAKING A HERO.

Reproached for His Cowardice. HIS SOUL IN SPIRIT LAND.

Pehaps it would never have happened had a comrade given him a word of encouragement. But the men were too intent on the grim work before them, so, in the hail of the lead, when Private Cory dropped to the ground it was generally understood that a bullet had knocked him over. Such, however, was not the case, as the ambulance carps following in the rear soon discovered. He had merely fainted from fright.

The doctor turned over the shivering bit of humanity to look for the wound, found none, and smiled. Cases of this kind were not unknown to him. "Poor fellow," he murmured. "Let him remain with the rest."

"No, he is not hurt at all," he said to one of his assistants. "His wound will come afterward, when he recovers from that faint, and God help him then. There is no bullet wound that will give him the agony that is before him."

"Shall I throw a bucket of water over him, sir?" asked the man with a blood-stained bandage around his head, but sufficient of his face left uncovered to show his intense disgust at his comrade.

"No, you must not disturb him," was the curt answer, and he turned to give his attention to the burdens which the stretchers were now quickly depositing in the improvised hospital.

"Poor lad," he mused as he bent over his work. "I must give him a word of encouragement when he comes 'round."

But when, later on, Private Cory staggered to his feet, the kindly doctor was too busy to notice him. He looked wonderingly round the tent. Then the remembrance of what he had done seemed to rise up and strike him full in the face. He sank down again with a choking sob. He clutched the earth with his hands, as men do when struck down in battle with a mortal wound. It was a burning hot day—the wounded were suffering terribly from the intense heat—but he shivered with cold. Outside, the shells were screaming, while now and again came the subdued but harsh growl of the smaller arms. It seemed as if a thousand voices were shouting at him and reproaching him for his cowardice. Then a human voice joined in the wild orchestra.

"You bloomin' cur. Call yourself a man?"

It was the stern sergeant of his company, who had been brought in wounded in three places before he had given up. His face was gray with the pain he was enduring, but he must needs give vent to his disgust at such pusillanimity. A contemptuous smile played about his bloodless lips.

"I call it gettin' money under false pretenses. You're clothed and stuffed with the best o' everything the country can send out, includin' a briar pipe and baccy, and then yer go and—Pah!" and he broke off. "I couldn't hev believed it o' any man in the whole bloomin' company."

He stopped because the pains of his wounds became too great, and he bit hard the piece of Cavendish he had in his mouth to stifle a groan, but other men took up the cue.

No agony of the battlefield could equal what Private Cory was now enduring. He quivered as if affected by some powerful electric current, but he made no answer to their taunts, and continued to lie with his face turned to the ground. He tried to reconstruct the wreck of his manhood, but his brain was still in a whirl, and those shrieking shells outside still seemed to be telling the world that he was a miserable coward.

A man was handing round some broth. He had been hours without food, and the savory odor caused a craving hunger to take possession of him. A pannikin full was being passed, from which men took a drink, their expectant comrades looking on with eager, wistful eyes. Cory raised his head, hoping his turn had come, but he was immediately greeted with a storm of curses that caused him to drop it again. Fool that he was to expect it. He might have known.

At that moment the doctor came up.

"Give Cory some of that soup. Hold up, my lad," he said, not unkindly; "you may make a soldier yet. Drink this," and he handed him the tin vessel.

"He is a broth of a boy," shouted a man, and this poor joke was greeted with laughter even by those who knew that they had but a few hours to live.

Cory sat up. The soup seemed to put life into him, and he ceased to shiver. He was barely out of his teens, but his face, in its ashy grayness, looked more like that of a man who had passed his prime.

"Feelin' a bit better now!" began the sergeant.

"He'll run for it as soon as he's able," remarked another. "Whew! listen!" he broke off, as a shell exploded just outside. "They seem to have got the range of us now. Nice Christians, these Boers, firing on the Red Cross."

For a few seconds there was silence as the men realized their danger. The angry growl of the quick-firers was every now and then punctuated by the long, deep-mouthed baying of the Boers' Long Tom.

"They are aiming at us, by God!" shouted a man, running into the tent with his right arm hanging helpless by his side.

Immediately there was violent concussion, the air was filled with dust, smoke, and a pungent smell, and the end of the tent lit up with a tongue of flame. In an instant three or four men sprang forward and the fire was extinguished.

"The devils are firing at us," cried the sergeant. "The next shot will count a bit, if I am not mistaken."

Scarcely were the words out of his mouth when a huge rent suddenly opened in the canvas and a shell dropped right into the middle of the tent. The wounded ducked under their covering as if they would bury themselves beneath the ground. The doctor, with another, rushed as he seized the bomb.

"Not you, doctor," he shouted, as he seized the bomb.

"Quick, my man! Into the bucket with it!" said the doctor. "No! There's no water! My God——"

But Cory had dashed through the opening and was running like a hare. They were all dumbfounded for a moment. Then a cheer broke from them when they realized what he was doing—a cheer in which dying men joined.

"Throw it away! Throw it!" yelled the doctor after him.

Still he ran. The music of what he knew was their applause rang in his ears. Nothing had ever sounded so sweet to him as this. He smiled. It reminded him faintly of his achievements in the football field, when the crowd roared their approval. The ball he carried now was heavier, but the applause—only he knew what it meant to him, and he clutched the destructive missile like a child hugging a doll. He felt inclined to kiss it. If he lived he would be a man and a comrade again. If not—but he ran on.

Some one has wisely said that it requires often but the turn of a straw to make a coward a hero, or a hero a coward. Cory was now a man again. The paralysis of panic that had seized him a few hours ago and had frozen his heart existed now only as a hideous dream. Another ten yards—he was quite fifty from the tent. He heard them urging him to throw it. A few more yards, then with a tremendous effort he hurled it from him. Instantly there was an explosion, and Cory fell on his face.

"Poor chap! He is done for, I doubt," said the doctor, as several raced forward, followed by a number of wounded, who limped in pain.

They knelt by his poor shattered body. The sergeant, his old tormenter, regardless of his own wounds, had been among the first who rushed to his assistance.

Cory raised the only hand left him, which the N. C. O. clasped, murmuring something about forgiveness. A smile of exultation played about his comrade's face for a moment, then the film of death gathered over his eyes. He tried to speak, but no words came in obedience to the moving of his lips, for his soul had taken its flight to that land where brave spirits are at rest.

ETHICS OF CLIMATE

A Careful Study of Criminology. THAT WHICH LEADS TO CRIME.

Scientific inquiry is invading every department of study, says the San Francisco Chronicle, but the demonstration that crime and climate are indissolubly connected and that upon the state of the one the other is directly dependent, comes with something of a shock to moralists. Advance sheets of a paper on "Conduct and the Weather," by Edwin Grant Dexter, Ph. D., about to be published as a monograph supplement to the Psychological Review, presents an exact scientific determination of what has hitherto been little more than popular superstition, and demonstrates by unerring statistical method that human morality is in the aggregate the toy of atmospheric influences.

The data upon which Dr. Dexter bases his conclusions consist of the tabulation and replies to questions sent to some 200 teachers of all grades from the kindergarten to the high school, to superintendents of asylums and reformatories and wardens of penitentiaries, considered in connection with meteorogical reports, these studies being made in the cities of New York and Denver. On the one hand were the complete official records of misdemeanors in public schools and in penitentiaries, arrests for assault and battery, arrests for insanity, the death rate, suicides, clerical errors in banks, and strength tests in the gymnasium of Columbia University. On the other hand were the Weather Bureau records. A period of ten years was covered and over 400,000 data considered.

The barometrical readings of New York and Denver, although covering about the same range, differ some five inches in the actual height of the barometrical column. The absolute density of the atmosphere is shown to have little or no effect, the local variations alone appearing to be of moral moment. Lowered barometrical pressure, indicating the approach of storms, is first shown to exercise a distinct effect in inciting to violation of the law.

Every grade of crime and misdemeanor and breach of discipline save one is shown to increase slowly but irregularly from the lowest temperatures up to 65 degrees, uniformly and at a greater rate of speed from 65 to 80 degrees, then more rapidly, reaching the maximum between 80 and 85 degrees. When 85 degrees is reached and passed, whatever the evil seething in the human heart, it ceases to manifest itself to any extent in deeds. The writer, who is not a sentimentalist, attributes the fact that after this point is passed crime drops to 33 per cent less than the normal merely to the physical impossibility of offensive action under such conditions. For suicide alone an excess is marked for very low temperatures, and this is rationally accounted for through the increased misery such temperatures bring to the unfortunate in general.

The prevailing impression that actual storm conditions have a baleful effect upon human disposition is overturned by these figures. No class of data studied shows an excess for high humidity, and cases of assault, of insanity and misdemeanors are actually diminished. On the other hand, Denver shows a marked increase of crime during low humidities. Another surprise comes in the demonstration that high winds, so often accused of having a nervous effect, are really quieting in their moral influence.

Dr. Dexter refers the whole problem of conduct to surplus energy, arguing that during meteorological conditions most energizing, deportment is at its worst, while during devitalizing conditions active disorder is prevalent. In other words, active disorder is, in a sense, the safety valve to surplus energy, which must make itself evident in some form of activity, and the form taken is likely to be disastrous to the discipline sought to be maintained by teacher and policeman.

Science is bringing strange revelations to the moralist. Since the day when the discovery was made that insanity was a disease, in many cases amenable to intelligent treatment, and the chains and shackles were stricken from the limbs of the inmates of a madhouse, the world has learned that drunkenness is a disease, that criminal propensities in some cases indicate uncorrected heredity, and in others may be accounted for by actual degeneration of the substance of the brain.

BANDS OF MERCY.

Founded for the Boys and Girls. THEY TEND TO SPIRITUALITY.

Women of the Chicago Anti-Cruelty Society, says the Times-Herald, have a dream of boys playing the part of protectors of the alley cat and the stray dog rather than taking their old-time role of the creatures' persecutors. The way that the women have gone to work makes it seem that their dream is in a fair way of realization. Hereafter the workers hope that a wild bird may perch in safety at a boy's elbow, for the making of slungshots is to become speedily a lost and forgotten art. The hungry dog waif may approach either the street boy or the "mother's" boys with the certainty that the tail he is wagging will not soon be so weighted down with a load of tin cans that the process will be an impossibility.

The Anti-Cruelty Society, with Mrs. Theodore Thomas as its president, has started a work the expressed intention of which is to make anti-cruelty societies absolutely unnecessary in the future. Mrs. Thomas sums up the whole end and aim of the work thus: "We wish to teach the children to take such an interest in the living, healthy animal that they will lose all desire to kill or impose suffering."

Within the last few weeks six bands of children have been gathered together for the set purpose of being taught the lesson of humanity. The children are not given any generalizations on the subject of cruelty, but are told animal stories which carry their own point and moral. It has been found that the boy, above all things, admires courage, and the first great fruits of the work have come from the awakening realization among children that the inflicting of suffering upon the weaker creature is the worst form of cowardice. This fact pressed home has brought a great change in some of the worst of boys.

Four of these bands of mercy have been started on the North Side and two on the South Side. It is the ultimate intention of the society to spread them all over the city and to reach every class of boy from the street arab to the parlor pet. Five of the bands are composed of both boys and girls. The sixth band, a great deal larger than any of the others, is made up of scores of lads who pass nine-tenths of their time in the streets and alleys of the city. There are 300 of them in this one class alone, and their noise capacity is something terrific.

The membership comes largely from lower Kinzie, Michigan and Illinois streets and from the Goose Island and Little Hell districts. Miss Jennie Stearns of 352 Chicago avenue, gathered this great crowd of boys together unaided. How she did it would be something of a mystery were it not known that she has "a way" with boys that to the ordinary mortal is past finding out. This band has been found to be too large for the most efficient work, and it is to be broken up into smaller classes, provided some cruelty-hating and animal-loving friends will step into the breach and offer their services to Miss Stearns.

A meeting of the boys of this band was held one evening at the residence of Mr. Bradley, 419 East Erie street. It is doubtful if a more thoroughly interesting collection of youngsters was ever before gathered together. Three large connecting rooms with a large central hallway were packed full of boys ranging in age from 7 to 16 years. Every step of the stairway was filled and all the banisters from top to bottom bore a boy burden. It is not the aim of the Anti-Cruelty Society to hold the boys in with a curb rein, for it is believed that if they are not allowed a certain amount of freedom they will not go to the meetings, and the work would die at its birth. To the speakers is left the task of holding the audience, and almost invariably they are successful, the deafening racket of one minute being succeeded by the dead silence of the next. The boys are true gallery gods. They do not applaud with the hand, but express their approval of a speaker's good points by stamping and ear-piercing whistling.

Mrs. Theodore Thomas was present at this Erie street meeting, and her first words when she rose to address the boys were: "Do you like a coward?" Instantly there was a noisy negative from exactly 266 throats. The negatives took the form of "No," "Not on your life," "Nit," "They're yeller," and some other sincere if slangy "streetisms." When the boys had fully expressed their disapproval of cowardice in all its forms a hush came over them, and Mrs. Thomas proceeded with a story of a small boy who had thoroughly thrashed a much larger boy who had insisted on torturing an alley cat. The victory of the smaller lad over the larger was put down to the fact that he was fighting in a good cause, a point which the auditors seemed to catch quickly. Mrs. Thomas held them in rapt attention until the small boy was victorious and the animal was safe. Then her listeners cheered her, the story and the courage of the small boy, and wound up with a cheer for the alley cat.

One of the directors of the Illinois Audubon Society said a word to the boys on behalf of the birds. He told them that there was more fun nine times over in watching the live bird than there was in handling a dead one. He caught their sympathies with a tale of a bluejay's defense of its nest and told them something of bird characteristics that were worth noting. It did not take five minutes at that meeting to show that the noisiest of the boys could be held quiet with a story that touched on animal life. Those elders who were present and who had had long experience with children said that animal stories were potent interest producers when everything else failed.

When the meeting was over the Audubon director found himself confronted with a question that would have puzzled Solomon for an answer. The Audubonite hates English Sparrows as he hates the shadow of the evil one, but he was present as the guest of the Anti-Cruelty Society, and as sparrows can suffer as well as anything else, what was he to do when five boys waited on him and said: "Say, mister, kin we kill English sparrows?" The bird society director referred the questions to their director.

The bands of mercy are already a success. Some of the leaders of the movement are compelled daily to find homes for stray cats and dogs which street children, with newly awakened sympathies, bring to them for care and protection. Last Monday afternoon five small boys called at Miss Stearns' residence and informed her that they had found the body of a dead bird. They said they had buried it carefully, and were going to get a small flag to erect over the grave. Mrs. Theodore Thomas took home with her from the meeting the other night a stray fox terrier which some of the boys found in an alley after their dismissal. The stray is now installed in a country home with the kindest of kind masters.

Other bands of mercy which have just been started by the Anti-Cruelty Society are the Blue Star Band, Miss Madeleine Smith, teacher; Trinity Band, Mrs. L. M. Melander, 521 LaSalle avenue, teacher; and bands of which Mrs. O. J. Waters, 32 Delaware place, Mrs. J. M. Campbell, 260 Bowen avenue, and Miss Annie Faulkner are directors.

Thus it is that good seeds are being sown, tending to the spiritualization of those who participate in this movement. Spiritualists generally should engage more in humanitarian work; without it the world would soon commence to retrograde.

Their Division Our Safety.

The Boston Transcript tells of a town in Maine, with a population of 2,000, where there are fourteen churches, each but one in full blast, with regular services. The average salary of the pulpit-pounder in that town is $300 a year.

Very few have stopped to think how much the world of thought is indebted to these opposing sects for the freedom it enjoys. United in one denomination they would become intolerant, oppressive, and tyrannical, overriding all opposition by brute force. Divided into hostile camps they tolerate others that they may be tolerated in turn.

There is not a Christian sect in existence which would not imitate Catholicism in its most persecuting stage, was it clothed with ample authority to enforce its demands, and could itself be immune.

HERO WORSHIPERS.

Shoulder Straps on a Clod. SOME PERTINENT REMARKS.

Friend Underwood strikes a true chord in what he said about Dewey. Hero worship seems almost like an instinct of the race. While we sneer at persons for worshiping an invisible God, a mere idealized abstraction, it is if anything a more absurd affair to deify a human being, a poor mortal made of the same kind of mud as the balance of us. But it seems to be human to do so. Of course it is hardly just. Take the case of Dewey for instance. A combination of favorable circumstances placed him to the front in the naval battle in Manila bay. He had no more ability—possibly not as much—as some of the marines under his command, or as the man Gridley who fired the first shot. He displayed no more patriotism, not a whit more courage, than the humbler men under him, and yet his name is lauded, he is feted, cities go wild in receptions, flags float, guns roar a welcome, and we act as if the gods had come down indeed.

There is this excuse. At heart we do love and honor every man of them, each in his place doing his duty. But we cannot know them all individually, and we cannot make a parade and holiday for every man. So we select the fellow who happened to be to the fore, and using him as a representative, we pour out upon him our honors and endearments. We speak to him what we mean for all. We feast him as we are willing to do all if it were possible. Dewey probably doesn't know this, and very likely imagines that all this bottled up enthusiasm, the wining and dining, is for himself alone. Poor old soul! If he could read the great heart of the people beneath all this exterior of flowers, pageantry and good will, he would behold himself as merely the representative of those who, equally with himself, had come into the affection of a grateful people. Not for himself but for all the brave sailor's who were with him on that day, are those honors shown. See how flat fell his pitiful "boom" for the presidency. That was for Dewey only and did not arouse the enthusiasm necessary to explode a fire cracker in a back alley. When he stands, however, not for himself, though he is a good commonplace old body, but as the representative of a class whom we love, then we do our best.

There is my analyses of the situation, but I am free to say that I think the whole proceeding foolish. My platform is that of the Irishman who said of America: "In this foine counthry, be-dad, one man is as good as another, and better, too."

Some years ago a number of fellows paid car-fare, which their families needed, to go to a town in Iowa and see Mr. Bryan as he went through on a Burlington train. A glimpse, a two-minute speech, that was all. I told them I would not walk across the street half as quick to shake his hand as that of our old, well-known townsman, Riley Magee. I would not go two miles to-morrow to see Mr. McKinley if I could get the information I needed from a neighbor. But then, I am a crank.

A friend came to me and said: "Beecher, I want a dollar from you." I wanted to know wherefore. "Why, for the Logan monument fund," said he; "to build a fitting monument to the memory of Gen. John A. Logan." I told him I would not give him a cent. At that very time we had in our town a wreck of a man, so poor that charity had to be extended to him. He had failed up till then to get a pension, although he had an honorable discharge, and had been in Andersonville prison nine months. Every dictate of honor said give to this living wreck the money and I did so.

Moreover, brethren, and I take heart of grace to say it now, hero-worship of this kind is awful in injustice. Congress bestows a great pension on the widow of Gen. Logan, but the widow of my poor friend, who starved in Andersonville prison, is neglected. Honor to whom honor is due, justice to whom justice pertains.

I am not much of a worshiper anyway, and especially I am not in danger of hero-worship. Putting shoulder-straps on a clod does not make it better than any other clod. Give, as nearly as possible, to every man just what he merits, no more, no less.

HIS FATE IN A DREAM

Dr. Gibier Has a Premonition. TOLD HIS WIFE OF HIS VISION.

That Dr. Paul Gibier, the founder of the Pasteur Institute in this city, who was killed in a runaway in Suffern, N. Y., (says the New York Press) had his death and the tragic manner of it foretold to him a dream was made known by his wife recently. Strange as it may seem, he laughed away his wife's fears when he told it to Mrs. Gibier, although it coincides strangely with his belief of mind, matter and immortality.

It was the matron of the Pasteur Institute who told of Dr. Gibier's dream. It was told to her, she said, by Mrs. Gibier. On last Friday night Dr. Gibier, who had been ill with lumbago, slept for the first time in twelve days. When he awoke on Saturday morning he related to his wife a strange dream which he had had.

He said that he dreamed he was out riding alone and had been thrown from his buggy and killed. It was in that way that death did come to him only a few hours later, the reality being that Dr. Gibier was accompanied by his mother-in-law, Mrs. C. V. Hoern, of Baltimore, when he was killed.

Dr. Gibier had many strange views on immortality, hypnotism, hypno-magnetism and auto-suggestion, and during his lifetime he wrote these words:

"One of the simplest yet one of the most powerful proofs that intelligence exists apart from matter may be found in the sort of an experiment where subjects under the influence of an operator become at certain states seers, and see objects and persons invisible to those in a normal state."

In this case Dr. Gibier was the seer of his own sad fate, although the startling portrayal of it to him did not impress him at the time.

Dr. Gibier's body was brought to the Pasteur Institute and placed in state in one of the parlors. It was surrounded with floral tributes. Friends and relatives of the dead physician and scientist called during the afternoon and there were many who came to pay respects during the evening.

The body looked strangely life-like, and the dead man seemed to be sleeping peacefully more than in death. There was no visible scar or wound to show that violence had caused death, the wound on the back of the head being concealed.

Dr. Gibier some time ago made considerable stir in the world by declaring that he had absolute proof of immortality. He said he knew absolutely that the soul of the higher self of man survives the dissolution of the body.

"It can be proved in several ways," he said, "namely, through hypnotism, hypno-magnetism and psychic experiment. One of the simplest yet one of the most powerful proofs that intelligence exists apart from matter may be found in the form of an experiment where subjects under the influence of an operator become at certain states, seers, and see objects and persons invisible to those in a normal state—things and persons which sometime leave an impression on a photographic plate.

"Man is immortal, and even eternal," held Dr. Gibier, "for although matter and force may be transformed they remain anatomically the same for all time." He also held that neither matter nor energy has intelligence, and, since this is true, there must be a third element, and it must be co-existent with matter. To this he gave the name of intelligence, or soul.

"When death occurs," wrote Dr. Gibier, "the spirit is the first to leave the body, leaving it in a more or less rapid way, according to the manner of death. At the same time a certain part of the energy is dissipated, and in a gradual way re-enters the great common storehouse of universal energy. Another part of this force remains bound to the spirit, without which it would probably return to universal intelligence, just as the matter of the body and a certain quantity of its energy return to the ambient matter and energy. But it is later that this force definitely leaves the body, providing it (the body) has not been destroyed by fire or through any other destructive cause immediately after death."

Hypnotized Her Daughter.

A dispatch from Tacoma to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, contains the following:

"There was almost a riot at the Northern Pacific passenger station as the midnight train was ready to pull out for Portland, carrying the 'Shiloh' revival party, which had been holding services in the city for the past ten days and seeking recruits for the 'Shiloh' college in the state of Maine, of which the Rev. Sandford is the controlling spirit.

At the Ecclesia mission, where the revivalists have been holding their meetings, a girl of about 18 years, who is about to come into a handsome fortune, fell under the religious spell of the Rev. Sandford, and was induced to enroll as one of the band of 'students' which the company was recruiting for its religious school in Maine. When the time came for the meeting to break up and good-byes were being said the girl's mother, a gentle-mannered lady with gray hair, was so overcome at the thought of losing her only daughter that she appealed to the girl not to leave her. The daughter was about to listen to the appeals of her mother, when the revivalists intervened, warning the girl that to listen to the cries of the flesh was to lose her immortal soul, and abjuring her to remain steadfast, deluging her with quotations from Scripture and denouncing the pleadings of the mother, until the poor woman fell in a faint.

"The girl was then hurried away where she could not hear her mother's heart-rending cries, and the party went to the railway station, where the mother, who had escaped the crowd at the mission, again made a frantic attempt to regain her daughter. Again she was met by the revivalists, who warned her that she was seeking to cause the ruin of her daughter by turning her away from the religious work which God had marked out for her. Indignant citizens then took a hand and attempted to reason with the revivalists, who returned them Scripture quotations.

"A policeman was called, but upon finding the girl was over 18 year of age, said he could do nothing. The crowd then made a rush at the revivalists, but were met by them under the leadership of the Rev. Sandford, and with their umbrellas flourishing in a threatening way and they called down the wrath of God upon the Ungodly, putting them to flight. Not one of the gathered citizens cared to take the lead in a knock-down fight and rescue, and the girl was allowed to proceed, leaving her poor mother prostrated. She is said to-day to be in a critical condition."

We believe the whipping-post is a relic of barbarism, but we would not object seriously to having it used on this revivalist who took the only child of this aged mother.

HUMANITARIANISM,

As a Factor in Spiritualism. LIFE WORK OF MRS. BOOTH.

As set forth by the Daily News, never since Frances Willard was in the prime of her noble womanhood and heroic earnestness has there been seen a finer example of the power of oratory as shown by a woman consecrated to her life work than in the address of Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth before the Methodist quadriennial conference at the Auditorium. Mrs. Booth, the "little mother," as she is known by 8,000 men in the state prisons of the United States who have gladly accepted her leadership in Christian living, had a grand opportunity in speaking to that great body of delegates representing methodism all over the world. And it was the unanimous verdict, not only of the delegates, but of the vast assemblage which welcomed her, that she rose to the opportunity. To say that it was a signal ovation to her natural gifts and charms of oratory would not be altogether true, though these had their weight. It was rather the spontaneous welcome given by an audience of earnest and intelligent men to a new cause and work which were presented in such a masterly and effective way as to win sympathy and compel admiration. No amount of ordinary preparation would have sufficed for such an effective appeal in behalf of the many thousands of men now serving sentences in the state prisons of this country. It was evident that Mrs. Booth had paid the price for that evening's triumph by years of devoted work in a cause which had almost escaped the attention of the religious world.

Even to recapitulate the facts she so effectively presented would be difficult, as no summary could do justice to an enterprise which has been carried on under such conditions as confronted Mrs. Booth when the Volunteer Prisoners' League was organized four years ago. During those four years Mrs. Booth's life has been given to her prison work and the corridors of Sing Sing and Joliet are as familiar to her as they are to the wardens or the prisoners themselves. From the former over 800 men have "graduated," to use Mrs. Booth's phrase, and most of them have passed through Hope hall at Flushing to an honorable and virtuous life, which would not have been possible to the vast majority of them without the work in their behalf done by the "little mother." From Joliet about 200 have gone to Hope Hall, Chicago, with similar results. Of the work in other prisons detailed information was not given, but from South Carolina to Maine, and from Maine to California Mrs. Booth is now known as the convict's friend and the wardens of state prisons are always eager to welcome her and aid her.

Many difficulties that lie in the way of the convict's return to honorable and virtuous life have been vividly portrayed by Victor Hugo in "Les Miserables." Americans who have not heard Mrs. Booth tell of her prison work will be surprised to learn that the difficulties are scarcely less in America to-day—or rather were, before these thousands of men behind the bars found a friend and "little mother" in Mrs. Booth.

The leader and founder of the Volunteer Prisoners' League has no sympathy with that morbid sentimentality which bestows flowers and gifts upon murderers and makes a hero of the man upon whom society has placed its ban. All she seeks to obtain is "justice for the convict" and a chance! That and the abolition of some of the more barbaric customs of certain penitentiaries are what she pleads for and is giving her life for in heroic effort.

Incidentally Mrs. Booth paid this state a high compliment as leading in the right way in adopting the indeterminate sentence. The general acceptance of this humane and reasonable method of dealing with state prisoners, supplemented by such work as Mrs. Booth and her league are doing, is silently effecting a mighty reform in prison conditions in the United States—a reform which will be greatly expedited by the enthusiasm engendered in the great quadrennial conference of Methodism under Mrs. Booth's inspiration.

To say nothing of the religion of Mrs. Booth, her humanitarian work is grand and beautiful. Her self-sacrifice, her devotion to the interests of the criminal, and her unselfish spirit manifested on all occasions, places her in the front ranks of humanitarians. Spiritualists should begin at an early day to make humanitarianism a special factor in their lives.

This Is a Christian Nation.

The proof is pointed. Who can doubt it? A great strike is in progress in St. Louis as we write. Street car workers want better wages, so they refused to labor and determined others should not. Failing to wholly stop the cars because of police interference they determined the people should not ride, however great their necessities.

On the 8th inst. a furious mob attacked Miss Lena Kaenter who in some way incurred their displeasure. Says the report:

"They stripped her to the waist and daubed her with green paint, while jeering boys and women applauded the outrage. Two shop girls were attacked an hour later. They were partly denuded, but escaped."

A barbarous people would not be guilty of such grossness. And a savage tribe guilty of it would deserve extermination. But it was paralleled in the 5th century, when an Alexandrian mob, incited by the Christian Bishop Cyril, since sainted, led by Peter, the Reader, attacked the teacher Hypatia, a philosopher and mathematician, dragged her from her chariot while on the way to her Academy, stripped her naked, forced her into a church, cut the flesh from her bones with oyster shells, then burned it to ashes.

Says Goldsmith, slightly abridged:

"Nature was never more lavish of its gifts than it had been to Hypatia, endowed as she was with the most exalted understanding, and the happiest turn to science. Education completed what Nature had begun, and made her the prodigy, not only of her age, but the glory of her sex. * * She joined to her charms of person a virtue that might repress the most assuming. Though in a city, the resort of all the learning then existing in the world, there was not one who could equal her in knowledge; yet with such accomplishments, she was the most modest of women. Calumny never dared to suspect her morals, or assail her character."

MEDIUMSHIP

Manifested Through Psyche, AND ALSO THE PSYCHOGRAPH.

While honest public mediums will always occupy the front ranks in the glorious work of spreading Spiritualism among people at large, there are phases of mediumship of less prominent character, that are not enough known and cultivated, though they could fill an important place in small circles and could be a great help to single individuals. Thousands are situated in a way, locally or circumstantially, that they have seldom or never a chance to attend a seance or any public spiritual demonstration, and even home circles are often out of the question for many people. But wherever there is access to a post-office wherever a spiritual paper can reach us, there we can also obtain one of the above-named magnetic boards, and mediumship can be developed in most cases, provided the sitter has the necessary amount of patience, and is a tolerably good speller. One or two sitters, and one recorder, seem to be usually the best arrangement; but the writer of this never had an assistant and obtained most satisfactory messages on both the Psychograph and Psyche. The latter is very sensitive, but requires also more delicate handling than the former, which is less sensitive, but stronger. After all, the choice of one of the two seems only a matter of personal preference.

It is an astonishing fact, that numbers of the former planchette and ouija boards are scattered all over the country, without doing any good to speak of, and it passes any serious person's understanding, how people calling themselves "intelligent," can use the aforesaid boards as mere toys, mere frivolous pastimes; confessing without blushing, that it never occurred to them to think of any deeper principle underlying those demonstrations. This is the height of thoughtlessness. Of course, their silly or frivolous questions received mostly adequate answers, as like attracts like, in both worlds. But such a state of things could not fail to discredit this special phase of mediumship. Should the improved magnetic boards be used in the same spirit as their predecessors, there would be no better results, in spite of their superiority. No kind of mediumship will amount to anything unless exercised in a spirit of reverence by pure and honest people. Such people, when at the same time earnest and intelligent investigators, cannot fail to obtain full evidence of spirit return, in the most direct way; provided they succeed to establish good magnetic connection between their own higher selves and those in sympathy with them on the other shore.

Mistakes are made on both sides of the current; lying messages are sometimes received from intruding spirits; certain laws have to be studied and certain meanings interpreted; streets, numbers, names and other minor things required on earth correctly given are often mixed up by the correspondents, who evidently are apt to forget things, for which they have no use any more. Events are sometimes said to have happened, while they are only approaching; some things, repulsive to human sentiment are mentioned in the simplest matter-of-fact way, while others seem magnified by strong imagination, and misleading to those investigators who would take everything in a literal sense. In one word, keen study, observation and discrimination are necessary, but will pay sooner or later, and a large amount of information about life in the spirit world can be gained by this very simple mediumship. At any rate, the communications thus received seem to admit but one explanation, namely, that the correspondents are distinct individualities, discarnate and sometimes incarnate; though we cannot see or touch them. It is like telephonic or telegraphic intercourse between two worlds, or rather a combination of both systems.

The purpose of these lines is not to expand on news received from the spirit world by said magnetic instruments, but to show others the way to receive news for themselves. True missionary work might thus be done in the simplest way and with the least expense, especially in remote districts. May these hints reach a good many people who yearn for spiritual truth.

THE SOUL OF THE VIOLET.

Whenever, betimes, the warm winds blow
And drive underground the lingering snow;
Whenever, amid such breathing space,
The brown earth rises a wistful face—
Whenever about the fields I go,
The soul of the violet haunts me so!

I look—there is never a leaf to be seen;
In the bleached grass is no thread of green;
But I walk as one who would chide his feet
Lest they trample the hope of something sweet!
Here can no flower be blooming, I know—
Yet the soul of the violet haunts me so!

Again and again that thrilling breath,
Fresh as the life that is snatched out of death,
Keen as the blow that Love might deal
Lest a spirit in trance should outward steal—
So thrilling that breath, so vital that blow—
The soul of the violet haunts me so!

Is it the blossom that slumbers as yet,
Under the leaf-mold dank and wet,
And visits in dreams the wandering air
(Whereas the passing sweetness I share)?
Or is it the flower shed long ago?
The soul of the violet haunts me so!

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Prof. J. W. Kenyon and Mrs. J. W. Kenyon would like to correspond with societies anywhere for work for season of 1900 and 1901. Mrs. K. is said to be one of the best test mediums in the field to-day. Societies desiring settled speakers and mediums address them at Onset, Mass., P. O. Box 166. During the camp season of July and August Mr. and Mrs. Kenyon hold test seances in Phylis Hall, Onset, Mass.

B. F. Austin writes from Toronto, Canada: "I have the following dates open for engagements: August 2 and 3 for Southwest Michigan or Northern Illinois; August 6 for some point near Clinton, Iowa; August 9 for Michigan, near Michigan Central line; August 10 for New York, near New York Central line. All interested can write me at 81 O'Hara avenue, Toronto, Canada."

Mrs. M. L. Mayotte writes from Texas: "My new premium, The Next World Interviewed, was received a few days ago. Like all your readers, I feel deeply indebted. I found the book so interesting that I could not lay it aside until I had gone from cover to cover. I could not rest until I had finished it."

W. D. Noyes writes from Columbus, Ohio: "The Columbus (Ohio) Camp will open under favorable conditions, June 30, at 4:30 p. m. Flag-raising, and address by Dr. J. C. Kroesen, of Columbus. 7:30 p. m., lawn social and band concert. Welcome address by Mayor Swartz, of Columbus; Worthington welcome address by the Hon. Justin Pinney, of Worthington. Rev. Samuel King, M. E. minister of Columbus, will deliver the welcome address in behalf of the Christian people. Camp opening address will be delivered by Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y. Spirit messages will be given by Cora B. Noyes. 2:30 p. m., dedication ceremony by Lyman C. Howe. Spirit messages by Cora B. Noyes. Choir of sixteen voices at every Sunday service. The favorite Columbus City Band will be in attendance every day during the season. Concert by City Orchestra Band every Wednesday and Saturday evenings."

A summer school for parents will open at Vrilia Hights, Geneva Lake, Wis., July 9, 1900. Fathers, mothers and educators will gather in council, seeking the best good of the child. Self-discipline for parenthood will be a prominent feature, while all practical phases of home and school education will be discussed in the spirit of love and helpfulness. Leading a child to the unfoldment of inherent powers and forces requires knowledge that is born of wisdom and love, the best thought of father and mother. Gathering in the heart of the woods, the pupil-parent, the true student, will be inspired by the song of birds, the deep of waters, the hush of night and nature's many wonder workings. Competent men and women will each day lead a child study round table, to which all are invited to contribute their best thought and experience. "That which we are, we shall teach." For further particulars, address, Alice B. Stockham, M. D., 56 Fifth avenue, Chicago, Ill.

E. B. Sargent, a veteran Spiritualist, writes from Haverhill, Mass.: "Enclosed you will find two dollars and ten cents for The Progressive Thinker one year, and Vols. 1, 2 and 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World. I am 83 years old, and never before have I known so large an amount of valuable reading matter disposed of for so trifling a sum. Like the most of those of my age a large majority of my dear ones are in the spirit world, hence it will be seen that that world looks nearer to me than to those just starting in life."

The Indianapolis Sentinel says: "There is a church building in Harrison county, near Corydon, the old capital of the state, which has been, by common consent, abandoned and is now never used. Soon after the building was constructed the sexton securely locked the doors at the conclusion of services one Sunday evening, but when he returned found all the doors standing wide open. At first he gave the matter little thought, thinking that some of the trustees or persons privileged to enter had been there during his absence. He locked them securely at the close of services that evening, and returning, found them wide open, as usual. Time and again was this experience repeated, and the sexton began to be puzzled. Night after night vigil was kept but no one ventured near the church, yet when the sexton or trustees would approach the buildings the locks would be found turned and the bolts shot back, giving free access. Effort after effort was made to solve the mystery, but without avail, and now the doors are never locked, as such a proceeding would be useless. The story of the mysterious happenings has become so well circulated that there is no necessity of locking the doors, even if they would stay shut, as no one would have the temerity to venture near the edifice with evil designs. Tramps, who would be expected to select the building as a place to sleep, have heard the story and avoid it as they would a pest."

G. W. Kates and wife are engaged for camp-meetings during August at Mantua, Ohio (Maple Dell), and Grand Ledge, Haslett Park and Island Lake, Mich. Their address is 560 Seventh avenue North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

T. S. Russel writes: "Mrs. L. N. Claman, present pastor of the Englewood Spiritual Union, delivers her lectures under complete entrancement or spirit control. Her entire appearance and voice changes to that of a man who knows how to teach spirituality and forcibly impress the hearers of the importance of living spiritual lives. We expect to continue our regular services through the summer. We will camp at home, and will be glad if members of other societies whose pastors are off on an outing, will visit our meetings on Sundays at 2:30 and 7:30, and Thursdays at 2 p. m. Mrs. Claman conducts all services and her messages are as good as the best. We have engaged the Universalist church for our entertainment on the 22d, as our hall is too small."

Mrs. L. A. Coolidge writes: "As I read The Progressive Thinker, I feel that sublime uplifting of the spirit, that no other reading gives me. I hope you may long live to give those beautiful truths to the world."

Dr. B. F. Weythman writes from Memphis, Tenn.: "I received the Occult Life of Jesus a few days ago. It is a splendid volume. I, like others, am astonished that it is a premium to a paper that in itself is richly worth $2 per year."

M. C. Holmes writes from Concord, N. H.: "The book, the Occult Life of Jesus of Nazareth, duly received. I am very much interested in the book."

Mrs. P. Calm writes from New York: "Allow us to express our hearty appreciation of your kindness in sending the book, Encyclopedia of Death, which arrived safely. It is the third present you have sent us, the other two being Ghost Land and Art Magic, and I assure you that we feel proud of them, and grateful to you for placing such books within our reach, as it would be beyond our means to buy them."

H. Bay writes from Seattle, Wash.: "Yesterday I received the last of the seven beautiful books. I have gained both knowledge and pleasure."

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale, a prominent worker in the ranks of Spiritualism, writes from Fort Worth, Tex.: "Surely the world does not know what a feast is furnished in The Progressive Thinker a whole year and four premium books, and all for 2.25. I would not sell my books alone for five times the price of all, if I could not replace them. I had been deprived of The Progressive Thinker for a year or more, moving about from place to place, lecturing, and when it came, it was like the face of a faithful friend of 'Lang Syne.' The very sight of it was cheering. Your 'Divine Plan' must be in charge of the angels, for never before was so much given for so little. I would not exchange my subscription alone for $2.25 if the exchange compelled me to be a year without the paper. May spirit friends open broader fields and may its usefulness grow with each issue. I send personal thanks for the books, as they are practically a present."

B. G. Sweet writes: "It does not seem possible that you can give so much reading matter for so little money. I have all the books in your list of premiums, except Vol. 3, and either of the books is worth according to regular book prices not less than $1.50, yet you are almost giving them away. Should you raise the subscription price of The Progressive Thinker to $1.50 or even $2.00, I still would not do without it, and I am sure the angel world appreciates your grand effort in spreading the glorious truth, even though some of the mortals do not."

Helen A. Case writes: "I have read those four premium books. I consider them excellent food for thought."

J. H. Clark writes from Lansing, Mich.: "Mr. E. W. Lincoln, of Pinconning, Mich., gave two fine lectures to our society, Sunday, June 10, which were well appreciated by fair audiences. Mr. Lincoln is a young man and a forcible speaker. He speaks for the Owosso society next Sunday."

A very delightful informal reception was given to Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, by the friends in Bloomington, at the residence of Mrs. Ada Bartoni.

Correspondent sends the following Buffalo items: The Rev. Moses Hull and his wife, Mattie E. Hull, are at Camp Lily Dale, attending to the school that they have established there. The Rev. A. J. Weaver is also at same camp for the season. Mr. Hull returns every Sunday and holds two meetings each Sunday at the Temple. Mrs. Hull returns also to attend her lyceum.

The old Buffalo Spiritual Church Society is in splendid shape just now; full attendance each Sunday; good speakers, and a grand good test medium in Mrs. Catherine Chase.

J. W. Dennis is now a "Reverend" as he was properly ordained last Sunday by the president and officers of the Buffalo Spiritual Church Society. Mrs. Catherine Chase gave Mr. Dennis his lesson upon the duties of his newly-acquired office. Her control, Mr. Watson, was the speaker upon this occasion.

The Buffalo Psychic Society gave a well-attended social, June 13, for the benefit of said society.

All of the five societies in Buffalo are doing nicely.

F. Grimshaw is to be one of the principal speakers at the Freeville Camp, N. Y.

E. V. Morse writes from Lorain, Ohio: "Please announce that the Progressive Thought Association of Lorain, Ohio, would like to correspond with an educated lecturer with the intention of making engagements (perhaps monthly) should terms, recommendations, etc., be satisfactory. There seems to be a profitable field in this part of the state for a good lecturer, and also for a test medium. Some one combining the talent of a good organizer with the rest would prove a much needed factor in our association."

In passing upon the case of Mrs. Emma Nichols and Mrs. Crecenzia Arries, Christian scientists, in Milwaukee, Wis., Judge Neelen decided that they were guilty of violating the Wisconsin medical law, in that they were practicing medicine without a license or proper qualifications. The defendants have taken an appeal. Judge Neelen, in his decision, after quoting the state statutes and reviewing the case which led to the suit so far as Christian Scientists constitute a religious body, they were entitled to be treated with perfect toleration, but when they profess to be able to heal physical ailments they become amenable to the law. After reviewing the right of the state to act in matters of public health, Judge Neelen said: "Under existing laws, to heal the sick, or, to use equivalent words, practice medicine, is not construed by the courts as applying exclusively to the administration of drugs and the use of instruments, but may be properly construed to mean the treatment in any manner of one who is ill, as a Christian Science healer or a practitioner for a fee, and Christian Scientists so undertaking the cure of the sick without license to practice medicine become thereby subject to the penalties of the law. This in no way interferes with the religious belief of anybody." In conclusion the court cited the Mormon case decision to show that even in matters of religious belief the laws of society designed to secure its health might not be interfered with. "However free," he said, "the exercise of religion may be, it must be subordinate to the laws of the land."

Mrs. L. J. Oviatt (formerly Mrs. L. J. Vaughn) has just returned from Louisville, Ky., where she served the Church of Spirit Communion for three months, and one month for the First Spiritual Society of Muncie, Ind. Since her return she has served the Second Church of the Soul of Chicago. She leaves here about June 20, for Milwaukee. She wishes to announce that for business and advertising purposes she has obtained the legal right to the name, Mrs. L. J. Oviatt. All communications should be addressed to her at 212 Ogden avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. Georgiana Staples Davis writes from Augusta, Maine: "I want to thank you most sincerely for the four premium books received not long ago—the three volumes of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, and The Next World Interviewed. To say I am pleased with them but feebly expresses my appreciation. They are grand; are both interesting and instructive, and every Spiritualist and investigator should read them. I consider them a great addition to my occult library."

Mrs. Edwards writes from Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa: "I have rented Oak Glen Cottage for June, July and August, and shall be glad to have any visitors who may be in this vicinity call. Workers in the cause especially invited. My work in Davenport seemed satisfactory, and my stay of four weeks was very pleasant. I had some good circles, and promised to make a return visit before going back to Chicago."

Scribe writes: "G. W. Kates and wife held the first grove meeting of the season, at Bederwood, Minn., Saturday and Sunday, June 9 and 10. On Saturday the weather was so forbidding that the morning meeting could not be held. In the afternoon, Mr. Kates spoke against a high wind with, good good effect. Mrs. Kates gave tests. The weather on Sunday was clear, but 'the wind blew as it listeth.' A more secluded spot in the grove was selected and two excellent meetings held. Mr. Kates spoke upon 'The Science of Spiritualism,' and Mrs. Kates upon 'Evidences of Immortality.' The attendance was quite large for this district and the condition of the weather. We occupied a splendid grove near Stubbs Bay, the property of Bro. Stubbs. We are glad to say that Brother and Sister Kates are stirring our state until Spiritualism is becoming a popular ism. Our society at Bederwood is prosperous, and we look forward to greater things in the future."

Twenty-five cents for adults and fifteen cents for children, will entitle you to a reserved seat to hear an impersonated reading on the story of "Ben Hur," illustrated with 82 life-size views on canvas, and a chance to see and hear the youngest child entertainer of the century, in her recitations, posing and pantomime. This entertainment will be given by Lee Norie Claman, assisted by Baby Claman. Stewart avenue Universalist church, 65th and Stewart avenue, June 22, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Russell says that Baby Claman is a prodigy.

Correspondent writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union Society is progressing at a rapid rate in spite of the weather since Mrs. Lee Norie Claman was engaged as speaker. Our Sunday attendance is always large. Mrs. Claman's idea of giving the phenomenal before the lecture is meeting with favor, and we are now able to close our meeting at an earlier hour than heretofore, making it more convenient for those coming from a distant part of the city. On Sunday morning, June 10, a pleasing ceremony took place. Mrs. Geo. S. Lincoln, one of the well-known workers of the society, was presented with a spiritual emblem pin; the presentation was made by Mrs. Claman on behalf of the society. It was a complete surprise to Mrs. Lincoln, who was so affected that she could not reply to the presentation speech, but her little guide 'Sunshine,' took matters in her own hands and expressed her own as well as her medium's appreciation. In spite of Mrs. Claman's many engagements for the summer camps, we expect to keep her as our speaker until the close of this season. This will be gratifying to many who have not been fortunate enough to hear her. It is a treat not to be missed."

Dr. P. S. George writes, illustrating the evil effects of medical laws, from Pawnee City, Nebraska: "I write this while sitting in a cell of the Pawnee county jail, at Pawnee City, Neb., being charged with the violation of the medical law in this state. I refused to give bonds, and they have committed me to jail to await a hearing in the district court. This is the second time I have been imprisoned the past four years. I am occupying a joint cell with a young man from Tecumseh, Neb., charged with the crime of murdering his brother, so you see what this medical law will do with a man that is not charged with the commission of any crime. My case comes up to-morrow; what the result will be I am unable to say. I will, however, write you in full."

Those excellent mediums, Mrs. Alice Gehring and family and W. C. Jessup and family, are permanently located at 2979 Wabash avenue. Circles Monday and Thursday at 8 p. m.

Tom Clifford and family of Cleveland, Ohio, will spend July 4 with Mr. and Mrs. Hudson Tuttle, at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

J. M. White writes from Alvo, Neb.: "A good slate writer or trumpet and materializing medium is badly needed in this vicitiy and can get not less than three months' steady work in this locality besides itinerant work on a circuit that I am endeavoring to establish. Only honest, moral workers wanted, and we especially desire those who want to locate. For further particulars address J. M. White, Box 97, Alvo, Neb'"

While in Oregon, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley's address will be at 290 Columbia street, Portland.

Correspondent writes: "The Harmonial Society of Los Angeles, California, is in prosperous condition. Our new speaker, Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, is drawing large audiences, and making a host of friends. The lyceum is rapidly increasing in numbers and interest of a marked nature is being taken in the work under Mrs. Gillespie's leadership. The Southern California Camp is to be carried on this season. It will continue through the entire month of September. Good speakers and mediums are engaged, and prospects are good for a splendid camp. Mrs. Gillespie gave the memorial address for the Spiritualists at the Soldiers' Home, Santa Monica, Cal., May 29. Assembly Hall was crowded. After the lecture, Mrs. Augusta Armstrong, in behalf of the veterans, presented Mrs. Gillespie with a beautiful bouquet of roses. The occasion was to be long remembered, it being one of the most enthusiastic audiences. Mrs. Gillespie was engaged for another lecture the last Monday in this month."

J. M. Coghill writes: "The First Spiritual Church of Toronto, Canada, held a series of meetings in May, which under the able leadership of Dr. Ewell, proved a success in every way. At the close of his work here the church presented him with an illuminated address as a token of their esteem. We have secured Mrs. R. W. Barton, lecturer and test medium, for the balance of the season, and her work here has proven her to be a medium second to none that ever visited Canada."

Dr. C. E. Watkins has returned from Denver, Colo., and is now located at his old home, Ayer, Mass.

Mrs. E. M. Dole, a most excellent psychometric, test and prophetic medium, has returned to Chicago, and may be found at Dr. Bushnell's, 1080 North Clark street. She has been spending the last six months in California.

Mrs. M. A. Reed, after an absence of nearly two years in California, has returned to Chicago. She will go East soon. She is an excellent medium.

Dr. A. B. Spinney, of Reed City, Mich., was in the city the beginning of the week attending to professional business.

THE BEST YET.

The N. S. A. Home Fund.

To the Editor and Friends:—I am delighted to announce to you the receipt this morning of a check for one thousand dollars for the Mayer fund, from a veteran Spiritualist of Massachusetts, who writes me as follows: "I am eighty-one years old, and have worked hard for small wages to earn this. I am anxious to do something for the cause we all love so well."

Is not this a gentle reminder to wealthy Spiritualists who could emulate the example of this aged friend, without feeling it in purse depletion as he probably has done, that a check from them, would do a great deal of good for "the cause we all love so well," in the line of helping to complete the N. S. A. Home fund? The munificent gift of this good old man brings a blessing with it, his genial words give us new hope and life, we are strengthened in our belief that the Angels have this organization in charge, and that it is bound to move serenely on. Next to the property given by Mr. Mayer, with his donation, too, of five hundred, this check from Massachusetts is the largest contribution we have received for the fund.

A blessing of thankful joy goes out to the venerable friend who has done so well by the Home to-day, from our hearts, we feel that he lives very near to the angels, and that Spiritualism is a vital factor in his daily thought and deed, we are assured that he has builded well for the home that awaits him in the eternal world.

Our thanks, too, go out to the editors of our spiritual papers for the help they have given the N. S. A., and the Home fund, for it has indeed been of great worth. We are also thankful to Brother Cole, of Michigan for starting the twenty-cent "Labor fund" for the Home project, for we are daily receiving additions, with most kindly words, from friends everywhere, to the fund from twenty cents upwards, all of which is appreciated and very thankfully received.
